Holding Health Insurance Marketplaces Accountable:
The Unheralded Rise and Imminent Demise of Structural Reform
Litigation in Health Care

Sarah L. Grusin337

As the government's level of engagement and role in the healthcare profession has become increasingly augmented and complex, questions about accountability for regulation of the new health insurance Marketplaces and established public insurance programs, such as Medicaid, have moved to the forefront of the enforcement arena. This article posits that strict statutory interpretation and direct governmental involvement are not necessarily the most efficient methods of increasing governmental accountability under existing insurance regulations and that instead, the growing practice of private enforcement through structural reform litigation may prove to be the most effective method of straddling the boundary between state and federal laws and the private sector in the ever-changing healthcare landscape.
