The Public Interest Law Reporter (PILR) is an innovative legal publication that focuses on current issues in public interest law and policy. Founded in 1995, PILR provides students, educators, and practitioners with information about, and thoughtful analysis of, contemporary issues in the area of human rights, economic equity, criminal justice, the environment, and both small and large-scale governance. The publication is produced, managed, and edited by Loyola Law students. Staff writers are selected through a write-on process and collaborate with editors to determine specific areas to research and write about. Feature articles provide more in-depth exploration of some particularly poignant or difficult issues. Additionally, selected articles from contributing authors are accepted for publication.
