Peremptory Challenges and Religion: The Unanswered Prayer for a Supreme Court Opinion

Courtney A. Waggoner

Follow this and additional works at: http://lawcommons.luc.edu/luclj
Part of the Courts Commons, and the Religion Law Commons

Recommended Citation
Available at: http://lawcommons.luc.edu/luclj/vol36/iss1/12

This Comment is brought to you for free and open access by LAW eCommons. It has been accepted for inclusion in Loyola University Chicago Law Journal by an authorized administrator of LAW eCommons. For more information, please contact law-library@luc.edu.
Comment

Peremptory Challenges and Religion: The Unanswered Prayer for a Supreme Court Opinion

Courtney A. Waggoner*

I. INTRODUCTION

Throughout the past twenty years, the United States judicial system has seen many changes in what governmental acts pass constitutional muster. One of the most hotly debated and rapidly evolving areas of constitutional law concerns the government's use of peremptory challenges in jury selection. Little more than a century ago, states had the right to statutorily exclude certain races entirely from the jury pool. Only in the past two decades, however, has the Supreme Court outlawed prosecutorial peremptory challenges based on race. Further, it was not until 1994 that the Court opined that gender was no longer a tolerable

* J.D. expected May 2005. I would first like to thank my family and friends, especially my parents, Rick and Debbie Waggoner and my sister, Erin de Lucia, for their constant encouragement and unwavering support, not only throughout the writing of this article, but in all of my endeavors. I would also like to thank the members and editorial board of the Loyola University Chicago Law Journal for all of their advice and hard work, without which, this article would not have been possible. Finally, I would like to acknowledge the faculty and administration at Loyola, and thank them for their support in the production of the Journal.

1. Please note that “peremptory challenge” will be used interchangeably with “peremptory strike” throughout this Comment.

2. See infra Parts II, III (discussing the changes concerning the constitutionality of peremptory challenges).

4. See Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 309 (1879) (holding unconstitutional a West Virginia statute that banned African-Americans from the jury pool). "And how can it be maintained that compelling a colored man to submit to a trial for his life by a jury drawn from a panel from which the state has expressly excluded every man of his race . . . is not a denial to him of equal legal protection." Id.

5. See generally Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79 (1986) (opining that eliminating a juror based on his or her race is violative of one's constitutional rights).
ground on which to exercise a peremptory strike. The Court’s movement to protect these two classes has prompted other similarly suspect classes to argue that they are also entitled to the same protections. More specifically, several recent decisions have questioned whether states should be permitted to allow the use of peremptory strikes based upon a potential juror’s religion.

Although courts are split on the treatment of religion-based peremptory challenges, the United States Supreme Court has yet to resolve the issue. Because of this failure to address the uncertainty surrounding the removal of jurors based upon religious beliefs, courts are left to articulate their own opinions, sometimes based on confusing and inaccurate reasoning. While some courts are unwilling to provide religion with the protection granted to race and gender, others make no distinction and grant the protection of individual rights to all of the above classes.

Part II of this Comment will examine the classes meant to be protected by the Equal Protection Clause, the history surrounding

---

6. See generally J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127 (1994) (admonishing the State’s use of gender as a basis for peremptory challenges). “Discrimination in jury selection, whether based on race or on gender, causes harm to the litigants, the community, and the individual jurors who are wrongfully excluded from participation in the judicial process.” Id. at 140.

7. See infra Part II.B.1 (discussing the treatment of religion as a suspect class).

8. See generally United States v. DeJesus, 347 F.3d 500 (3d Cir. 2003) (affirming the State’s exercise of peremptory challenges based on religious beliefs as opposed to religious affiliation); United States v. Stafford, 136 F.3d 1109 (7th Cir. 1998) (scrutinizing in dicta the use of peremptory challenges in relation to religious beliefs and affiliation); State v. Davis, 504 N.W.2d 767, 772 (Minn. 1993) (upholding the prosecution’s use of peremptory challenges in response to a potential juror’s affiliation with the Jehovah’s Witness faith), cert. denied by 511 U.S. 1115 (1994).

9. See Davis v. Minnesota, 511 U.S. 1115 (1994) (denying certiorari to 504 N.W.2d 767 (Minn. 1993)). Justice Thomas’s dissent argued that the issue should be heard and that strict scrutiny analysis should be applied peremptory challenges based on religious affiliation. Id. (Thomas, J., dissenting).

10. See infra Parts II.C.7, III (analyzing the different methods courts have used to address peremptory challenges and religion); see also Davis v. Minnesota, 511 U.S. at 1115 (Thomas, J., dissenting) (arguing that the Supreme Court should hear a Minnesota case dealing with religion and peremptory challenges); DeJesus, 347 F.3d at 500 (declining to reverse a decision to uphold peremptory challenges based on religious affiliation); Stafford, 136 F.3d at 1114 (distinguishing between religious beliefs and religious affiliation); Davis, 504 N.W.2d at 767 (holding that peremptory challenges based on religion violate the Fourteenth Amendment).

11. See infra Parts II.C.7, III (analyzing the different methods courts have used to address peremptory challenges and religion); see generally DeJesus, 347 F.3d 500 (discussing peremptory challenges exercised by the State to remove two jurors based on their degrees of religious involvement); Stafford, 136 F.3d 1109 (analyzing the use of peremptory challenges in relation to religious beliefs and affiliation); Davis, 504 N.W.2d 767 (upholding the prosecution’s use of peremptory challenges in response to a potential juror’s affiliation with the Jehovah’s Witness faith).
Peremptory challenges, and the key decisions that have led to race and gender protection under the Fourteenth Amendment. Part II will also explain the treatment of religion as a suspect class and the prohibition of peremptory challenges based on race and gender. Part III will then examine recent cases dealing with peremptory challenges and religion and the difference in reasoning used in the Third and Seventh Circuit Courts of the United States. Then, Part IV will look at the consequences of treating religion as a suspect class in the context of peremptory challenges. Part IV will also look at the potential eradication of peremptory challenges altogether due to the protection of yet another class of individuals. Finally, Part V will recommend that the Supreme Court grant certiorari to examine religion-based peremptory challenges and set forth the appropriate framework for the limitations on government actions in this area. This Part will then propose that the Supreme Court allow for this protection but distinguish between a potential juror's religious affiliation and his or her religious beliefs.

II. BACKGROUND

Peremptory challenges have long been an integral litigation tool in the United States judicial system; this section will address the history and continuing reformation of these vital judicial mechanisms. Part II.A of this section will begin with an explanation of the purpose and policies behind peremptory challenges. It will explain the origin and importance of allowing a litigant to strike a potential juror without cause

12. See infra Parts II, III (detailing the historical development of the use of peremptory challenges and the recent treatment of religion and peremptory challenges).
13. See infra Parts II.A-II.C.5 (explaining the legal development of peremptory challenges, the Equal Protection Clause, suspect classes, and the line of cases holding peremptory strikes based on race and gender to be invalid).
14. See infra Part III (evaluating the Third and Seventh Circuit cases related to peremptory challenges and religion, and explaining how the various circuits have utilized different reasoning).
15. See infra Part IV.B (identifying the potential problems for peremptory challenges with the protection extended to religion).
16. See infra Part IV.B (describing how the total elimination of peremptory challenges poses a potential problem with the extension of protection to religion).
17. See infra Part V (arguing that the Supreme Court must set forth an opinion on the limitations of peremptory challenges and religion).
18. See infra Part V (recommending that the Supreme Court establish a definitive opinion on the status of peremptory challenges and religion).
19. See Part II (detailing the historical development of peremptory challenges, their past limitations and the related cases).
20. See infra Part II.A (differentiating between "for cause" and "peremptory" challenges and explaining the legal principles behind the two).
by use of a peremptory challenge.\textsuperscript{21} Part II.B will discuss the Fourteenth Amendment generally and the Equal Protection Clause’s different standards of review based upon class.\textsuperscript{22} This Part will also discuss some of the classes that are regularly granted strict scrutiny analysis under the Equal Protection Clause, and will show how the Court should extend this protection to religion.\textsuperscript{23} Part II.C will begin by presenting a brief history of racial discrimination before moving into the central cases shaping the use of peremptory challenges.\textsuperscript{24} After chronicling the historical exclusion of African-Americans from juries altogether, this Part will explore the major cases leading up to the Supreme Court’s decision that race-based peremptory challenges are constitutionally unacceptable.\textsuperscript{25} Part II.C will then discuss in detail the Supreme Court opinion holding that gender-based peremptory challenges are also unconstitutional.\textsuperscript{26} Finally, Part II.C will conclude with a discussion of two state supreme court cases dealing with religion and peremptory challenges, \textit{State v. Davis} and \textit{People v. Wheeler}.\textsuperscript{27}

\textbf{A. Tools for Excusing a Potential Juror: For Cause and Peremptory Challenges}

The United States Constitution guarantees each defendant accused of a crime the right to a trial by jury.\textsuperscript{28} Prior to trial, a large number of potential jurors are considered for the twelve or fewer jury spots.\textsuperscript{29} After \textsuperscript{21} See infra Part II.A (comparing the elimination of potential jurors by use of cause and peremptory challenges).

\textsuperscript{22} See infra Part II.B (discussing the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment).

\textsuperscript{23} See infra Part II.B (illustrating how the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment has been extended to religion).

\textsuperscript{24} See infra Part II.C.1–5 (analyzing the historical treatment of discrimination in peremptory challenges); see also United States v. DeJesus, 347 F.3d 500 (3d Cir. 2003) (addressing peremptory challenges exercised by the State to remove two jurors based on their degrees of religious involvement).

\textsuperscript{25} See infra Part II.C.2–3 (delineating the two main cases, \textit{Swain v. Alabama} and \textit{Batson v. Kentucky}, which have contributed to the holding that peremptory challenges based on race violate the Fourteenth Amendment).

\textsuperscript{26} See infra Part II.C.5 (discussing \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama} ex rel. \textit{T.B.} and the Court’s holding that gender stereotypes are an improper basis upon which to exercise a peremptory challenge).

\textsuperscript{27} See infra Part II.C.7 (examining \textit{State v. Davis} and \textit{People v. Wheeler}, in which the Minnesota and California Supreme Courts consider peremptory challenges based on religion). See also State v. Davis, 504 N.W.2d 767 (Minn. 1993); People v. Wheeler, 583 P.2d 748 (Cal. 1978).

\textsuperscript{28} U.S. CONST. amend. VI.

a "pool" of potential jurors is formed through jury summons, the group is broken up into smaller units for specific trials.\(^3\) Once organized into these smaller groups, the judge and attorneys for each side question the venire about various topics, including personal background, personal opinions, and life experiences.\(^3\) This process of learning about any propensities or biases that a juror might have in relation to fairly weighing the evidence is called "voir dire."\(^3\) Through the process of voir dire, an attorney may challenge a prospective juror in one of two ways: for cause or by use of a peremptory challenge.\(^3\) If an attorney can prove, based on the prospective juror’s answers, that he or she is incapable of serving on the jury, an unlimited amount of jurors can be eliminated for cause.\(^3\)

---

31. Venire is defined as “a panel of persons who have been selected for jury duty and from among whom the jurors are to be chosen.” BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY 1553 (7th ed. 1999). See also Creating the Jury, supra note 30. Some examples of the types of questions that may be asked of potential jurors in a murder case are as follows:

"You’ll be seeing sad pictures of Johnny – the way he looked after his dead body was left in a ditch... will this make you so angry you won’t be able to be objective...?"

"Anyone feel they could decide a civil case where money is concerned, but don’t want to serve on a criminal murder case?"

"Is there anyone here who doesn’t watch news on television on a regular basis?"

"Is there anyone on the panel who does not agree that you will decide this case only on what you hear in this courtroom?"

"Have you known anyone who was murdered or whom someone attempted to murder? Or have you known the family of a murder victim or attempted murder victim?"

"Have any of you ever been trained in medical areas – for example, as a doctor, nurse, or emergency technician – or does anyone close to you have any type of medical training?"

"There will be a police officer here to testify. How many of you think that simply because a police officer says something, it must be true?"

32. "Voir dire" is an Anglo-French term that literally means "to speak the truth" and is defined as “[a] preliminary examination of a prospective juror by a judge or lawyer to decide whether the prospect is qualified and suitable to serve on a jury.” BLACK’S LAW DICTIONARY, supra note 31, at 156; see also Creating the Jury, supra note 30 (explaining the literal definition of voir dire).

34. Colb, supra note 29. An attorney can challenge a prospective juror “for cause” if that person states or otherwise expresses a bias against the attorney’s case. Id. A juror who has been struck for cause is one who “could not be trusted to engage in neutral, objective fact-finding.” Id. The number of for cause strikes is not set by law, and will “depend entirely on the number of potential jurors about whose ability to carry out their duties either party can convincingly raise Another method available to prosecutors to excuse jurors is the peremptory challenge. Unlike a for-cause elimination, a peremptory challenge allows an attorney to strike a juror without justification. Instead, peremptory challenges are based on things such as intuition or past experiences. These discretionary strikes made their way into American law from England and have been codified in federal statutes since 1790. Peremptory challenges are imperative not only for occasions where a for-cause challenge has been denied, but also when the concern about a potential juror’s fairness is not enough to illicit a for-cause challenge. During early examinations, courts were disinclined to question the underlying motives of a peremptory challenge. However, following several landmark cases, attorneys are now prohibited from using peremptory challenges to remove a juror based on race or gender.

B. The Fourteenth Amendment: Equal Protection Clause Analysis

Under the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, serious questions to the judge.” Id.

35. Collins, supra note 3, at 938.

36. Id.

39. State v. Davis, 504 N.W.2d 767, 770 (Minn. 1993); see generally John P. Marks, Bader v. State: The Arkansas Supreme Court Restricts the Role Religion May Play in Jury Selection, 55 ARK. L. REV. 613 (2002) (discussing an Arkansas Supreme Court decision regarding the State’s use of peremptory challenges based on religion).

all citizens are guaranteed equal protection of the law. In an effort to reconcile this constitutional promise with legislative measures, the judicial system has refused to uphold any law that imposes upon a specific fundamental right or targets a suspect class. In determining whether a governmental action is unconstitutional, the Court has developed a three-standard approach: rational basis, intermediate scrutiny and strict scrutiny. The applicable standard of review dictates the amount of deference that courts will give to the legislative action.

If a challenged legislative measure does not specifically affect a suspect class or does not endanger a fundamental right, then it will only undergo a rational-basis review. Rational-basis review consists of determining whether the challenged classification is rationally related to a legitimate state interest. When drafting regulations that are aimed at generally benign areas, such as economic regulation, states are given leeway to create legislation as long as it does not infringe upon fundamental rights.

The middle level of scrutiny is called intermediate scrutiny, which is sometimes applied to classes warranting a heightened level of protection. In determining whether an action that is subject to intermediate scrutiny is constitutionally valid, courts will analyze: (1) the importance of the governmental objective; and (2) whether the objective can be fulfilled by using the classification at issue.

42. U.S. Const. amend. XIV, § 1. The Fourteenth Amendment was adopted in 1868 for the purpose of "securing to a race recently emancipated, a race that through many generation had been held in slavery, all the civil rights that the [majority] race enjoy[s]." Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 306 (1879).

43. Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620, 631 (1996) (examining the constitutionality of an amendment to the Colorado state constitution that prohibited all executive, legislative, and judicial actions designed to protect homosexual citizens from discrimination). The Court stated that it would uphold a law that neither burdens a fundamental right nor targets a suspect class so long as the legislative classification bears a rational relation to some independent and legitimate end. Id.

44. Marianne E. Kreisher, Religion: The Cognizable Difference in Peremptory Challenges, 5 Widener J. Pub. L. 131, 136 (1995) (detailing the three standards used in equal protection analyses: (1) rational basis; (2) intermediate scrutiny; and (3) strict scrutiny).

45. Id.

46. See id. (describing the positive correlation between stricter standards of review and a challenge's effect on a suspect class).

47. Id.

48. See id. (implying that states tend to have fewer restraints in creating legislation when there is low risk of adverse effects on fundamental rights).

50. Kreisher, supra note 44, at 137 (discussing the factors used to determine constitutionality
Intermediate scrutiny is not as rigorous as strict scrutiny; therefore, classifications that would sometimes be deemed unconstitutional if affecting a class subject to strict scrutiny are permitted. However, in the case of peremptory challenges, gender, which is traditionally subject only to intermediate scrutiny, has been held to a standard equivalent to strict scrutiny.

When a class is deemed "suspect" under equal protection analysis, legislation may not single out members of that class unless that legislation is narrowly tailored to address a compelling state interest. This form of scrutiny applied to regulations affecting suspect classes is labeled "strict scrutiny." Strict scrutiny triggers a presumption against a law or practice when that law or practice is aimed at a particularly sensitive class of persons.\textsuperscript{56} The strict scrutiny approach attempts to weigh the government interest against the risk of discriminatory effects or outcomes.\textsuperscript{57} Although equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment was initially created in response to racial inequalities, the constitutional protections have been extended to gender and other classes.\textsuperscript{58} The Supreme Court has created a hierarchy of classes, where some classes are inherently more suspect than others.\textsuperscript{59} Based on this scheme, the Court has subjected certain laws and practices to higher levels of scrutiny, depending upon the class's level of suspicion.\textsuperscript{60}

1. Is Religion a Suspect Class?

The Fourteenth Amendment provides that no person shall be denied the equal protection of the laws of the United States by legislative action or judicial practices.\textsuperscript{61} The Supreme Court has interpreted this constitutional provision to mean that any law or practice that burdens a fundamental right or is aimed at a suspect class is unconstitutional, and therefore will not be upheld.\textsuperscript{62} The Court treats both race and gender as suspect classes for the purposes of peremptory challenges, forcing the Court to weigh the legitimate interests of the state against those of the proposed action or legislation.\textsuperscript{63}

\textsuperscript{56} See Kreisher, supra note 44, at 137 (describing the strong presumption strict scrutiny creates against a law or practice).

\textsuperscript{57} See \textit{id.} (explaining the balancing test included under the strict scrutiny standard).

\textsuperscript{58} See Hamburger, supra note 55, at 867 (analyzing the Fourteenth Amendment and the different standards of scrutiny).

\textsuperscript{59} Id. "The Supreme Court has had to distinguish among different classifications and has adopted a scheme in which some [classes] are more 'suspect' than others." \textit{Id.} While race and national origin are subject to the highest level of scrutiny, classifications such as age and "mental retardation" do not call for such strict standards. City of Cleburne. v. Cleburne Living Ctr., 473 U.S. 432, 441-43 (1985) (holding that "mental retardation" is not a classification calling for a more strenuous standard of review than that given to social or economic legislation).

\textsuperscript{60} See \textit{id.} (holding that an equal standard of review should apply to mental capacity and social or economic legislation).

Moreover, the Court has had to subject different types of classification to different degrees of scrutiny, initially because the Equal Protection Clause did not specify any forbidden classification, but especially during the past half century because the clause has increasingly been understood to protect against not only unequal constraints on natural liberty but also unequal privileges from government.

\textsuperscript{62} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{63} See \textit{infra} Part II.C.1-5 (discussing cases that have held race and gender to be an
As seen in multiple opinions, the Court has routinely held race to be a per se suspect class, demanding a legitimate purpose from the state before upholding the act. The purpose behind these opinions was to, in effect, eliminate state-supported racial discrimination. The Supreme Court's treatment of gender parallels that of race when dealing with peremptory challenges. The Court has opined that gender-based discrimination is as damaging as race-based discrimination. Both race and gender are immutable characteristics that can serve to impose stigmas on certain sectors of the population. Some argue that because religion is not necessarily inherent and unchangeable that it should not merit the same protection as race and gender. However, religion impermissible ground upon which to exercise a peremptory challenge).

66. See generally Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190, 197–98 (1976) (examining a law that allowed women over eighteen years of age to consume alcohol, while men needed to be at least twenty one years old before they were permitted to consume alcohol); Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677, 682 (1973) (discussing the right for a woman to claim her spouse as a dependent for purposes of attaining medical and dental benefits equal to those of males claiming their spouses); Reed v. Reed, 404 U.S. 71, 75–76 (1971) (striking down a law that gave males a preference over females in regard to estate administration).

67. In Bakke, Justice Brennan opined that "gender-based classification too often [has] been inexcusably utilized to stereotype and stigmatize politically powerless segments of society." Regents of the Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 360 (1978) (Brennan, J., concurring in the judgment in part and dissenting in part). In the Brief of the Appellees in Frontiero v. Richardson, the Solicitor General wrote that "sex, like race or national origin, is a visible and immutable biological characteristic that bears no necessary relation to ability." Brief for Appellees at 10, Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973) (No. 71-1694).

68. BARRON ET AL., supra note 65, at 594 (describing the detrimental effects of a class-based society).

69. Kreisher, supra note 44, at 165.

It is usually easy to determine a person's race and gender based solely on appearance. However religion is not usually apparent to the naked eye; "religious affiliation (or lack thereof) is not as self-evident as race or gender." It is sometimes possible to look should, and does, enjoy many of the same protections as other suspect classes because the freedom to choose one’s religion is a right granted by the Constitution.\textsuperscript{70} In addition, some courts have even gone so far as to deem religion an immutable characteristic.\textsuperscript{71}

Further, individual religions have been the basis of a long history of discrimination, much like race and gender.\textsuperscript{72} Although the Supreme at the name or physical characteristics of a person and guess that person’s religion. However, religion is different from race and gender in that the only way to determine a person’s religion with certainty is to inquire. Even then it is difficult to determine how great an influence religious belief has on the individual. Although religion is an association based on conscience, it is important to recognize that religious affiliation is a voluntary choice and can be changed.

\begin{quote}

\textit{Id.} at 167–68 (quoting State v. Davis, 504 N.W.2d 767, 771 (Minn. 1993)).

70. U.S. CONST. amend. I. “In short, when we are presented with a state law granting a denominational preference, our precedents demand that we treat the law as suspect and that we apply strict scrutiny in adjudging its constitutionality.” Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 246 (1982). “[Discrimination . . . [that is] purely arbitrary, oppressive, or capricious, and made to depend upon differences of color, race, nativity, religious opinions, political affiliations, or other considerations having no possible connection with the duties of citizens . . . would be pure favoritism, and a denial of the equal protection of the laws to the less favored classes.” Am. Sugar Refining Co. v. Louisiana, 179 U.S. 89, 92 (1900).

71. Kreisher, \textit{supra} note 44, at 165. In some instances, the legislature has provided by statute that religion is immutable. \textit{Id.} (arguing that the religious beliefs of a potential juror may create such a bias that the litigant should be permitted to strike a potential juror based on his religious beliefs); see also Galloway v. Louisiana, 817 F.2d 1154, 1159 (5th Cir. 1987) (addressing a civil rights violation and holding that to support such a claim a plaintiff must show membership in some group with inherited or immutable characteristic to meet the burden of proof); Schwager v. Sun Oil Co., 591 F.2d 58, 60 (10th Cir. 1979) (holding that the plaintiff established a prima facie case of age discrimination).

72. \textit{BARRON ET AL., supra} note 65, at 594.

Religious prejudice has taken many forms in this country. Puritans in colonial New England banished Baptists, Catholics were discriminated against in many colonies (there were laws prohibiting them from holding public office or starting their own schools; some colonies taxed ship captains who transported Catholics), as were Quakers. After the revolution, several state constitutions prohibited Jews and Catholics from holding public office. In the 1830s, the Mormons were attacked, their leader was killed by a mob and they were driven out of several states before finding refuge in Utah. Just before the Civil war, the American Party, better known as the Know-Nothing Party, became popular with its anti-immigrant, anti-Catholic views; that anti-Catholic bigotry would be apparent in the opposition to the Presidential candidacies of Al Smith in 1928 and John Kennedy in 1960. Antisemitism has been present throughout our history, from prohibitions of public worship of Judaism in some colonies to the exclusion of Jews from the neighborhoods, clubs and professions dominated by the Protestants throughout much of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries to the attacks on synagogues and virulent anti-Semitism propaganda of neo-Nazi groups in recent years. There was an [sic] element of religious prejudice directed against Muslims after the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, as the hijackers proclaimed themselves to be devout Muslims and some Americans assumed that all Muslims were on a mission from Allah to destroy America.

Court has not yet set forth an opinion stating such, it has been argued that these protections should be extended in the case of peremptory challenges to prevent the same generalizations and stereotypes that are the root of race or gender-based strikes. By failing to recognize the similar discriminatory motive behind religion-based challenges, courts are failing to protect the individual rights of potential jurors.

C. Unacceptable Uses for Peremptory Challenges

The United States has a long history of discrimination, which has been specifically aimed at particular classes. Various cases addressing (discussing religion-based discrimination).

73. Wronski, supra note 72, at 9. Some faiths have stereotypes surrounding them, which if allowed to influence a prosecutor's decision, would have the same effect as basing a peremptory challenge on race or gender. See generally J. Suzanne Bell Chambers, Applying the Break: Religion and the Peremptory Challenge, 70 IND. L.J. 569 (1995) (discussing the relation of religion to juror bias for the purpose of peremptory challenges and addressing whether equal protection principles should be applied to peremptory strikes based on religion in light of past Supreme Court decisions holding that peremptory strikes could not be used to discriminate based on race or gender). One source cautions: "On the matter of religion, attorneys who are defending are advised that Presbyterians are too cold; Baptists are even less desirable; and Lutherans, especially Scandinavians, will convict. Methodists may be acceptable. Keep Jews, Unitarians, Universalists, Congregationalists, and agnostics." REID HASTIE ET AL., INSIDE THE JURY 123 (1983).

74. Some courts mistakenly believe "that because members of a religious faith share the same doctrinal convictions by definition, then moral, social, political and philosophical beliefs characteristic of the faith may fairly be attributed to all of them." Scot Leaders, Unresolved Differences: Constitutionality of Religion-Based Peremptory Strikes, the Need for Supreme Court Adjudication, 3 TEX. F. ON C.L. & C.R. 99, 107-08 (1997). See also Susan Hightower, Sex and the Peremptory Strike: An Empirical Analysis of J.E.B. v. Alabama's First Five Years, 52 STAN. L. REV. 895, 903 (2000) (discussing the impact of J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B. on peremptory challenges and showing that the case has done little to extend restrictions on the peremptory challenge although many predicted the opposite effect).

Other than the differing views on religion, courts have been extremely reluctant to extend the supervision of Batson and J.E.B. to peremptory strikes against other categories of jurors. Both before and after J.E.B., people of Italian American descent have been found to be a cognizable racial group protected under Batson from discrimination based on national origin in the use of peremptory challenges. Yet lower courts have refused to extend Batson to a plethora of other categories. Classifications on which challenges are still permissible include veniremembers' age, reservations about the death penalty, socioeconomic status (including unemployment or poverty), occupation, disability, and obesity. On the other hand, a California appellate court recently held that gays and lesbians cannot be excluded from juries under the state constitution. In an interesting line of cases growing out of the Supreme Court's decision in Duren v. Missouri, plaintiffs have asserted that states are guilty of discrimination against women jurors in violation of the Equal Protection Clause when they refuse to pay for child care, particularly for sequestered jurors, but those claims are a step removed from the subject of the peremptory strike and so far have been unavailing.

Id. at 903-04 (footnotes omitted).
discriminatory actions related to peremptory challenges directed at certain groups of individuals will be presented in this section. This Part will begin by discussing Strauder v. West Virginia and the Supreme Court's opinion that the statutory exclusion of African-Americans from juries is unconstitutional.\(^75\) This Part will next review the Court’s Swain v. Alabama opinion, and the resulting burden of proof related to race-based peremptory challenges.\(^76\) Part III.C.3 will introduce Batson v. Kentucky as the Supreme Court's definitive opinion on the constitutionality of racial discrimination in jury selection.\(^77\) Then, Part III.C.4 will discuss the limitations on Batson, while Part III.C.5 will look at the recent Supreme Court decision outlawing gender-based peremptory challenges.\(^78\) Parts III.C.6–7 will then address peremptory challenges based upon religion and discuss two state supreme court cases dealing with the constitutionality of such challenges.\(^79\)

1. The Exclusion of African-Americans from Juries: Strauder v. West Virginia

Racial discrimination in particular has an extensive history in the United States judicial system.\(^80\) Many scholars have commented on the failure to provide African-Americans with equal rights and equal protection in the antebellum South.\(^81\) In addition, although

---

75. See infra Part II.C.1 (discussing Strauder v. West Virginia and stating that in all states, African-Americans were to be protected by the same laws as their white counterparts, which also prohibited states from depriving African-American defendants the right to have African-American jurors); see also Strauder v. West Virginia, 100 U.S. 303, 312 (1879) (holding a state statute preventing African-Americans from serving on juries unconstitutional since it violated the Equal Protection Clause).

76. See infra Part II.C.2 (discussing Swain v. Alabama and holding that although peremptory challenges are not necessarily subject to equal protection scrutiny, they cannot be used to specifically exclude African-American jurors); see also Swain v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 202, 227 (1965) (holding that the Constitution does not require an explanation of the motives behind peremptory challenges).

77. See infra Part II.C.3 (discussing Batson v. Kentucky, which revisited the reasoning in Strauder); see also Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 99 (1986) (holding that intentionally excluding African-American jurors violates equal protection and denies the accused an unbiased judgment by his peers).

79. See infra Parts II.C.6–7 (addressing peremptory challenges and religion and opinions discussing the issue from the Minnesota and California Supreme Courts).

81. Id. Many authors and scholars have commented on the social policies in effect before the Reconstruction sought to eliminate the maltreatment of African-Americans, racially motivated violence and discrimination continued for many years following the surrender of the Confederacy in 1865. Before the Civil War, Massachusetts was the only state that permitted African-Americans to serve on juries. During the Reconstruction era, some Southern jurisdictions began allowing African-American men to serve; however, officials in other states routinely barred all African-Americans from the venire. One of the first cases to challenge a state statute barring African-Americans from jury service was heard by the Supreme Court in 1876. Strauder v. West Virginia arose from an American Civil War, especially the victimization of African-Americans based on the failure to offer them the protections of the criminal law. Id. "Malcolm X spoke of how he 'learned to hate every drop of that white rapist's blood that is in me.'" Id. (quoting MALCOLM X, THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF MALCOLM X, 2 (1965)). "In the writings of Toni Morrison [and] Patricia Williams . . . the rape of slave women surfaces time and again as unredressed violation." Id. at 39–68 (discussing violence against African-Americans from before the Civil War until the civil rights movement one hundred years later). "Throughout the 1860s and 1870s, congressional hearings, newspaper accounts, and magazine articles were filled with stories featuring blacks who were beaten, murdered, raped, or robbed by angry, resentful, racist Southern whites whom local authorities were either unwilling or unable to restrain or punish." Id. at 39.
objection to a West Virginia statute enacted in 1873, which expressly limited jury service to white males. The plaintiff in Strauder, an African-American male, was convicted of murder in a West Virginia circuit court in October 1874. The jury that convicted the plaintiff was made up solely of white males, pursuant to a state statute. The plaintiff appealed the conviction, averring that he was deprived of his fundamental rights under the Fourteenth Amendment.

The Court found it critical in its determination of the plaintiff’s constitutional challenge to consider whether, in jury selection, prosecutors can purposefully and categorically exclude persons of the defendant’s race. In deciding Strauder, the Court attempted to interpret the reach of the recently drafted amendments to the Constitution, specifically the Fourteenth Amendment. The purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was to secure the freedom and equal protection of recently emancipated African-Americans, who had been denied the same civil rights granted to white citizens.

86. See Strauder, 100 U.S. at 312. The law in question was enacted on March 12, 1873, and defined citizens eligible to serve as jurors as “[a]ll white male persons who are twenty-one years of age and who are citizens of this State.” Id. at 305.

87. Id. at 304.

88. Id.

89. Id. Before the criminal indictment commenced, the plaintiff (then defendant), presented his petition stating:

[B]y virtue of the laws of the State of West Virginia no colored man was eligible to be a member of the grand jury or to serve on a petit jury in the state; that white men are so eligible, and that by reason of his being a colored man and having been a slave, he had reason to believe, and did believe, he could not have the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings in the State of West Virginia for the security of his person as is enjoyed by white citizens, and that he had less chance of enforcing in the courts of the State his rights on the prosecution, as a citizen of the United States, and that the probabilities of a denial of them to him as such citizen on every trial which might take place on the indictment in the courts of the State were much more enhanced than if he was a white man.

Id.

90. Id. at 305

91. Id. The Fourteenth Amendment states that:

All persons born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any laws which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

U.S. CONST. amend XIV, § 1.

92. Strauder, 100 U.S. at 306. Preceding cases showed that when this amendment was added to the Constitution, it was created in the pursuit of equality and the elimination of racial
In Strauder, the Court specifically held that the Fourteenth Amendment was meant to ensure that African-Americans were subject to and granted protection by the same laws as their white counterparts. More specifically, the Court explained that the Amendment dictated a positive immunity, or right, granted to African-American citizens. In addition, the Court held that the state had violated the Constitution by depriving African-American defendants the opportunity to have people of their own race judge their actions. The Court's subsequent decision to strike down the statute was the first major decision to recognize and observe the rights of African-Americans as related to jury service.

---

93. Id. See generally Slaughter-House Cases, 16 Wall. 36, 49 (1873) (discussing, in consolidated cases, a Louisiana statute held to violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment).

94. Id. at 308. The Court held that West Virginia's statute inflicted multiple harms, including one specifically burdening the entire African-American community:

The very fact that colored people are singled out and expressly denied by a statute all right to participate in the administration of the law, as jurors, because of their color, though they are citizens, and may be in other respects fully qualified, is practically a brand upon them, affixed by the law, an assertion of their inferiority, and a stimulant to that race prejudice which is an impediment to securing to individuals of the race that equal justice which the law aims to secure to all others.

Id. In addition to harming the African-American community as a whole, the Court also recognized the harm done specifically to the defendants as individual citizens: “It is not easy to comprehend, how it can be said that while every white man is entitled to a trial by a jury... selected without discrimination against his color, and a negro is not, the latter is equally protected by the law with the former.” Id. at 309. This positive immunity is essentially the exemption from “legal discriminations, implying inferiority in civil society, lessening the security of their enjoyment of the rights which others enjoy, and discriminations which are steps towards reducing them to the condition of a subject race.” Id. at 308.

95. Kennedy, supra note 80, at 171.

96. Id. at 309. Although Strauder served to outlaw statutes excluding African-Americans from juries, states still managed to prevent the race from fully enjoying this right. Kennedy, supra note 80, at 172. In an effort to articulate this trend, shortly after Strauder, Gilbert T. Stephenson published his findings after a project in which he sent questionnaires to the clerks of court in every Southern county where African-Americans made up at least one half of the population. Id. at 172–73. Some of Stephenson’s responses were as follows:

Alabama – County No. I, 10,000 white people, 13,000 Negroes: “Negroes are not allowed to sit upon juries in this county. It sometimes happens that names of Negroes are placed in our jury-box by mistake on the part of the jury commissioners, and are regularly drawn to serve as jurors; this, however, is a very rare occurrence. Once in the past four years, a Negro was drawn as a grand juror (by mistake) who appeared and insisted upon the court’s impanelling him with other jurors, which was done in accordance with law, the court having no legal right to discharge or excuse him. My recollection is he served two days, when he was taken out at night and severely beaten, and was then discharged by his own petition by the court. This will convey to your mind that negro jurors are not wholesomely regarded and tolerated in this county.”

Georgia – County No. I, 5,000 white people, 24,000 Negroes: “No Negroes serve on
2. Swain v. Alabama and the Initial Challenge of Using Peremptory Strikes Based Upon Race

After Strauder outlawed the statutory ban of certain races from juries, prosecutors began to rely on peremptory challenges to create the same exclusionary effect.97 Swain v. Alabama was the first case concerning these racially motivated peremptory strikes.98 Swain dealt with the conviction and sentencing of an African-American man by an all-white jury for the rape and murder of a white woman.99 During voir dire, the

---

98. See generally Swain, 380 U.S. at 227–28 (holding that the Constitution does not require an explanation of the motives behind peremptory challenges).

99. Id. At the time of the trial in 1965, twenty-six percent of the people eligible for jury service were African-American; however, no African-American had served on a jury in the county since 1950. Kennedy, supra note 80, at 194; see also Bryan K. Fair, Using Parrots to Kill Mockingbirds: Yet Another Racial Prosecution and Wrongful Conviction in Maycomb, 45 ALA. L. REV. 403, 433 (1994) (highlighting the persistent racism in the criminal justice system and suggesting ways for future law enforcement officials, lawyers, and judges to eliminate the underlying biases); Alfredo Miranda, “Now that I Speak English, No Me Dejan Hablar [‘I’m Not Allowed to Speak’]”: The Implication of Hernandez v. New York, 18 CHICANO-LATINO L. REV. 115, 120 (1996) (discussing Swain and the percentage of African-Americans available in the county to serve on a jury); James B. Zouras, *Shaw v. Reno: A Color-Blind Court in a Race-prosecutor struck all six African-American jurors.\textsuperscript{100} Although the defense objected to the state’s peremptory strikes, the trial court ruled against the constitutional challenge; the Supreme Courts of Alabama and the United States affirmed the trial court’s decision.\textsuperscript{101}

The United States Supreme Court concluded that nothing in the Constitution required a trial court judge to scrutinize the motives behind a peremptory strike if the prosecutor was using them as a tool for litigation.\textsuperscript{102} The Court noted that peremptory challenges by the State are appropriate as long as they are rationally related to the case at bar.\textsuperscript{103} In addition, the Court held that subjecting peremptory challenges to equal protection analysis and forcing strict scrutiny review would be fallacious and insulting to the very intent behind the peremptory challenge.\textsuperscript{104} The Court further reasoned that allowing all peremptory challenges to go without examination would effectively render all groups equally susceptible to exclusion.\textsuperscript{105}

However, the Court did recognize that the use of peremptory challenges by states as a means to specifically exclude African-Americans from the jury was in violation of one’s constitutional rights.\textsuperscript{106} Although the Court recognized and prohibited the use of strikes in a discriminatory manner, it also established an exceedingly high evidentiary burden for the party attempting to prove \textsuperscript{100} \textit{Swain,} 380 U.S. at 204.

\textsuperscript{101} \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{102} \textit{Id.} at 222. According to the majority:

\begin{quote}
The presumption in any particular case must be that the prosecutor is using the State’s challenges to obtain a fair and impartial jury to try the case ... [this] presumption is not overcome and the prosecutor therefore subjected to examination by allegations that in the case at hand all Negroes were removed ... because they were Negroes ... [allowing another result] would establish a rule wholly at odds with the peremptory challenge system as we know it. ... Therefore it is permissible to insulate from inquiry the removal of Negroes from a particular jury.
\end{quote}

\textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{103} \textit{Id.} at 223. Peremptory challenges are appropriate if they are founded upon “acceptable considerations related to the case ... the particular defendant involved and the particular crime charged.” \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{104} \textit{Id.} at 221. The majority opined that this treatment would lead to “a radical change in the nature and operation of the challenge [because it] ... would no longer be peremptory, each and every challenge being open to examination.” \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{105} \textit{Id.} at 212. Each and every group would be uniformly at risk regardless of “whether they be Negroes, Catholics, accountants or those with blue eyes.” \textit{Id.}

\textsuperscript{106} \textit{Id.} at 224. In an effort to prevent African-Americans, as a class, “the same right and opportunity to participate in the administration of justice enjoyed by the white population” by using peremptory strikes “for reasons wholly unrelated to the outcome of the particular case on trial” would violate the Constitution. \textit{Id.}
discrimination. The Court held that an equal protection violation would be found only if the defendant showed a history or trend of removing African-American jurors during voir dire. Due to the extreme burden associated with proving unconstitutionality, many defendants were unable to counter the state's use of the peremptory strikes. Although the opinion of the Court made little, if any, practical difference in the elimination of African-Americans from juries, Swain was the first case to at least recognize that peremptory challenges were subject to the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

3. The Burden of Swain Revisited in Batson v. Kentucky

Twenty years after Swain, the Supreme Court again evaluated the parameters surrounding a state's use of peremptory challenges in Batson v. Kentucky. Batson became the leading case for assessing the

107. Id. The Court stated that "it is permissible to insulate from inquiry the removal of Negroes from a particular jury on the assumption that the prosecutor is acting on acceptable considerations related to the case he is trying, the particular defendant involved and the particular crime charged." Id. at 223. In essence, the Court was allowing prosecutors to legitimately take race (among other considerations) into account when using their peremptory challenges. KENNEDY, supra note 80, at 196. In addition, the Court held that the prosecutor could not use racially charged peremptory challenges for reasons "unrelated to winning a given case," which translated into the exemption from constitutional scrutiny as long as the challenge was "trial-related." Id.

108. Swain, 308 U.S. at 224. More specifically the Court required that the State "in case after case, whatever the circumstances . . . be responsible for the removal of Negroes . . . with the result that no Negroes ever serve on petit juries." Id. at 222-23.

To overcome this presumption, the accused must bring forth, from cases other than the one involving the accused, evidence that the State used its peremptory challenges to dismiss all the members of a particular race from jury service. . . . [o]nly proof of this nature would support a reasonable inference that African-Americans were being denied the right to serve on a petit jury in violation of the guarantees of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Michelle Mahoney, The Future Viability of Batson v. Kentucky and the Practical Implications of Purkett v. Elem, 16 REV. LITIG. 137, 143 (1997). Many courts, such as the Fifth Circuit in United States v. Pearson, observed that overcoming this burden of proof requires tremendous diligence on the part of the defendant. See generally United States v. Pearson, 448 F.2d 1207, 1214-17 (5th Cir. 1971) (discussing the application of the burden set forth in Swain v. Alabama). The court specifically asserted that this would "require [the] checking of the docket for a reasonable period of time for the names of defendants and their attorneys, investigation as to the race of the various defendants, the final composition of the petit jury and the manner in which each side exercised it peremptory challenges." Id. at 1217.

109. Id. at 1216.

110. Swain, 308 U.S. at 224.

111. See Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 79, 99-100 (1986) (holding that a state's peremptory challenge would be deemed unconstitutional as violative of equal protection unless supported by a race neutral explanation). See also Cheryl A. C. Brown, Challenging the Challenge: Twelve Years after Batson, Courts are Still Struggling to Fill in the Gaps left by the Supreme Court, 28 constitutionality of a peremptory challenge.112 The petitioner in Batson was an African-American male indicted on charges of second-degree burglary and receipt of stolen goods.113 After excusing certain jurors for cause, the prosecutor used peremptory challenges to strike all four African-American persons on the venire, resulting in an all-white jury.114 The defense counsel moved to discharge the jury before swearing in, citing a violation of the defendant’s constitutional rights.115 However, the trial judge held that the parties were entitled to strike any members of the venire.116 The judge fully denied the petitioner’s motion, and the jury subsequently convicted the petitioner on both counts.117 After the Kentucky Supreme Court affirmed the decision, the United States Supreme Court granted certiorari and reversed the lower courts, citing an equal protection violation.118

The United States Supreme Court began its analysis by citing Strauder's holding that a defendant is in fact denied equal protection when members of his own race have intentionally been excluded from the jury.119 The Court also noted that racially motivated peremptory challenges are unlawful because they deny the defendant the very unbiased right to judgment by his peers that the Constitution intended.120 The Court reiterated the holding of Strauder, stating that racial discrimination in jury selection hurts both the accused and those who are denied the right to serve on a jury because of their race.121 The opinion also addressed the risk of jeopardizing the public perception of the justice system by allowing the State to use their challenges in the proposed discriminatory manner.122 The Court expressed concern that by allowing race-based challenges, society might begin questioning the objectivity of the courts.123

The Batson opinion was an opportunity to revisit the flawed

118. Id. at 84. The Court accepted the petitioner's Fourteenth Amendment argument and held that:

[R]acial discrimination in selection of jurors harms not only the accused whose life and liberty they are summoned to try. Competence to serve as a juror ultimately depends on an assessment of individual qualifications and ability to impartially consider evidence presented at trial . . . . A person's race simply is unrelated to his fitness as a juror. Accordingly . . . the Equal Protection Clause forbids [a] prosecutor to challenge potential jurors solely on account of their race or on the assumption that black jurors as a group will be unable impartially to consider the State's case against a black defendant.

Id. at 87-89.

119. Id. at 85.

120. Id.

121. Id. at 87. The Court specifically opined:

Racial discrimination in selection of jurors harms not only the accused whose life or liberty they are summoned to try. Competence to serve as a juror ultimately depends on an assessment of individual qualifications and ability to impartially consider evidence presented at a trial . . . . A person's race simply is "unrelated to his fitness as a juror."

Id. (quoting Thiel v. S. Railroad Co., 328 U.S. 217, 223-24 (1946)).

122. Id. Not only would allowing the strikes harm the defendant and certain races, but it "extends beyond that . . . to touch the entire community. Selection procedures that purposefully exclude black persons from juries undermine public confidence in the fairness of our system of justice." Id. (citing McCray v. New York, 461 U.S. 961, 963 (1983); Ballard v. United States, 329 U.S. 187, 195 (1946)). McCray v. New York was a case in which an African-American man was accused of robbing a white man. McCray, 461 U.S. at 968. At the defendant's first trial, in which the jury was unable to reach a verdict, all three African-Americans on the jury voted for an acquittal. Id. At the second trial, the prosecutors used their peremptory challenges to remove all seven African-Americans who were on the panel of potential jurors, which resulted in the defendant's conviction. Id.

123. Batson, 476 U.S. at 87.
evidentiary burden established in Swain, and the Court accordingly held that the Equal Protection Clause prohibits all racially-motivated peremptory strikes.\(^{124}\) Two main principles formed the foundation of the opinion: (1) prosecutors habitually abuse of peremptory challenges; and (2) the larger and more encompassing belief that racial discrimination by a state is per se unacceptable.\(^{125}\) The first principle, the overuse of race-based peremptory challenges, centered on the compulsive frequency with which prosecutors were striking certain races from the jury.\(^{126}\) Even Justice White, who authored Swain, concurred with the majority, stating that Swain should have presented a better framework for the government’s use of peremptory challenges.\(^{127}\) The Court intended the second principle to contrast Swain by asserting that racial discrimination through the use of peremptory challenges by the State is unacceptable, regardless of frequency.\(^{128}\) In reaching its conclusion, the Court effectuated a three-step procedure to ensure the elimination of racially motivated peremptory challenges.\(^{129}\) The first \(^{124}\) Id. at 84–85. “Batson withdraws permission for prosecutors to use race as a basis for peremptorily striking potential jurors, even if a prosecutor sees removing blacks as the best way to obtain a jury most sympathetic to the state’s side in a given case.” KENNEDY, supra note 80, at 204–05.; see also Kenneth J. Melilli, Batson and Peremptory Challenges, 71 NOTRE DAME L. REV. 447, 449–507 (1996) (discussing Batson and its progeny as well as the struggle to preserve the peremptory challenge, while also eliminating racial discrimination and finally questioning whether the peremptory challenge should in fact be preserved).

---

\(^{125}\) Batson, 476 U.S. at 85.

\(^{126}\) Id.

\(^{127}\) Id. at 101 (White, J., concurring).

\(^{128}\) KENNEDY, supra note 80, at 205. The racially motivated use of peremptory challenges is inappropriate “not only . . . when used to disenfranchise black potential jurors consistently, but also when used as a trial-related tactic in a single instance.” Id. The Batson Court held that “[a] single invidiously discriminatory governmental act is not immunized by the absence of such discrimination in the making of other comparable decisions . . . [and] to dictate that several must suffer discrimination before one could object . . . would be inconsistent with the promise of equal protection for all.” Batson, 476 U.S. at 95–96 (citing McCray v. New York, 461 U.S. 965 (1983) (alterations in original) (Marshall, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari)).

\(^{129}\) Id. at 96. The procedure for a challenge coming out of these cases, in detail are:

1. The opponent of the peremptory challenge must make a prima facie case of ethnic, racial, or gender discrimination, by disproportionate strikes, disparate treatment (in questioning, for example), a pattern of discriminatory treatment over time, or some other evidence.

2. The burden of production then shifts, and the proponent of the strike must offer a non-discriminatory (e.g. race neutral) explanation, which need not be “persuasive, or even plausible.

3. The trial court then “determines whether the opponent of the strike has carried his burden of proving purposeful discrimination.” Only at this step does “the persuasiveness of the justification” become relevant, and “implausible or fantastic justification may (and probably will) be found to be pretexts for purposeful discrimination.”
step involved showing, through a prima facie case by the defendant, that there had been purposeful discrimination in the selection of the jury.\textsuperscript{130} In order to establish this prima facie case, the defendant needed to prove that he was not only a member of a cognizable racial group, but also that the State exercised its peremptory challenges to remove members of the defendant’s race.\textsuperscript{131}

The second step shifted the burden to the State to give a race-neutral explanation for the peremptory challenge.\textsuperscript{132} Although the prosecutor’s standard was not arduous, it was insufficient to simply rebut the defendant’s challenge by stating that the jurors would have been more sympathetic to the defendant because of their common race.\textsuperscript{133} The third and final step was for the trial court, based on the arguments from both the state and the defendant, to determine whether or not the peremptory challenge was in fact based purely on race.\textsuperscript{134} The Court ultimately held that, according to the steps set forth, the failure of the prosecution to give a race-neutral reason for its actions warranted that the case be remanded for further proceedings.\textsuperscript{135}

\textsuperscript{4} If the trial court accepts the proponent’s explanation, that determination will involve a credibility assessment, at least in part, and a reviewing court therefore will accord the trial court’s ruling great deference.

130. Batson, 476 U.S. at 96. Some cases have held that “striking a single African-American, at least where voir dire was limited, was sufficient to raise an inference of discrimination.” Baccus-Lobel, supra note 112, at 19 (citing Morse v. Hanks, 172 F.3d 983, 985 (7th Cir. 1999)).

131. Batson, 476 U.S. at 96. “A prima facie case means an allegation supported by facts that, if left unrebutted, give rise to an inference that the allegation is true. Among the facts that might give rise to an inference of discrimination are a pattern of strikes against jurors of a given race or the prosecutor’s statements and questions during voir dire.” Kennedy, supra note 80, at 205. The defendant must show that the facts presented “raise an inference that the prosecutor used that practice to exclude the veniremen from the petit jury on account of their race... [this] raises the necessary inference of purposeful discrimination.” Batson, 476 U.S. at 96–97; see generally United States v. Greene, 36 M.J. 274, 282 (C.M.A. 1993) (holding that a peremptory strike based on “ethnic sexual behavior” was in violation of the Batson requirements).

132. Batson, 476 U.S. at 97. Although this requirement seems to compromise the “peremptory character” of the challenge, the explanation offered by the State need not rise to the level “justifying [the] exercise of a challenge for cause.” Id. However, the prosecutor cannot rebut the defendant’s prima facie case merely by “denying that he had a discriminatory motive or affirm[ing] [his] good faith in making individual selections.” Id. at 98 (quoting Alexander v. Louisiana, 405 U.S. 625, 632 (1972)).

133. Id. “When the prosecutor offers a nonracial explanation, the defendant can, of course, then seek to show that the nonracial explanation is a mere pretext. Ultimately, though, the defendant must persuade the judge that race played a part in the prosecutor’s decision to strike the juror in question.” Kennedy, supra note 80, at 205–06.

134. Batson, 476 U.S. at 98.

135. Id. at 100.

In 1995, the Supreme Court tested and further clarified the Batson rule in Purkett v. Elem. In Purkett, the State removed two African-American males from the jury panel in a case against an African-American respondent for alleged second-degree robbery in Missouri. The respondent fulfilled the first step of Batson, making out a primafacie case of racial discrimination, when he filed his petition challenging the State's actions. The justification given by the prosecutor for the dismissal of the jurors came into question when he explained his motives as relating to the hairstyles of the respective jury candidates.

In determining whether the strikes were purposeful race discrimination, the Court concluded that the State's justification did not have to be persuasive, or even plausible, in order for the Court to move on to the third and final step of a Batson challenge. The Court held that a peremptory challenge based on a potential juror's long, unkempt hair, mustache, and beard fulfilled the State's burden of articulating a nondiscriminatory motive for the challenge. In fact, the Court stated

---

137. Id. at 766.

138. Id. at 767.

139. Id. at 766. The prosecutor's explanation of his strikes:

I struck [juror] number twenty-two because of his long hair. He had long curly hair. He had the longest hair of anybody on the panel by far. He appeared to me to not be a good juror for that fact, the fact that he had long hair hanging down shoulder length, curly, unkempt hair. Also, he had a mustache and a goatee type beard. And juror number twenty-four also has a mustache and goatee type beard. Those are the only two people on the jury... with the facial hair... And I don't like the way they looked, with the way the hair is cut, both of them. And the mustaches and the beards look suspicious to me.

Id. The trial court was apparently content with the prosecutor's response and, without further inquiry, empaneled a jury that ultimately convicted him of second-degree robbery. Mahoney, supra note 108, at 165.

140. Purkett, 514 U.S. at 768. "At this [second] step of the inquiry, the issue is the facial validity of the prosecutor's explanation. Unless a discriminatory intent is inherent in the prosecutor's explanation, the reason offered will be deemed race neutral." Id. (quoting Hernandez v. New York, 500 U.S. 352, 360 (1991)). At the second stage of a Batson challenge, a trial court judge may not choose to disbelieve a "silly or superstitious" reason for the strike as long as it is race-neutral. Id. Demanding a persuasive or plausible explanation at the second step "violates the principle that the ultimate burden of persuasion regarding racial motivation rests with, and never shifts from, the opponent of the strike." Id. (quoting St. Mary's Honor Center v. Hicks, 509 U.S. 502, 511 (1993)).

141. Id. at 769. See generally Jason Hendren, Peremptory Challenges After Purkett v. Elem,... that the reason offered would be deemed race neutral unless the prosecutor’s explanation inherently implied discriminatory intent.\textsuperscript{142} By clarifying that the second \textit{Batson} step only requires a race-neutral explanation (plausible or not) before moving into an analysis of that reason in step three, the Court shed light upon the application of a \textit{Batson} challenge.\textsuperscript{143} By further clarifying \textit{Batson}’s requirement of non-discriminatory intent, both cases secured the right of potential jurors to be free from race-based peremptory challenges.\textsuperscript{144}

5. \textit{Batson}’s Application to Gender in \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama}, ex rel. \textit{T.B.}

The Supreme Court’s decision in \textit{Batson} led to cases questioning the constitutionality of peremptory challenges based on gender.\textsuperscript{145} Relying on \textit{Batson}, in 1994, the Supreme Court reviewed \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama}, ex

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item 142. \textit{Purkett}, 514 U.S. at 786.
\item 143. \textit{Id}.
\item 144. \textit{Id.}; see generally \textit{Batson v. Kentucky}, 476 U.S. 79 (1986) (holding that a state’s peremptory challenge would be deemed unconstitutional unless supported by a race neutral explanation).
\item 145. See generally \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama, ex rel. T.B.}, 511 U.S. 127 (1994) (discussing the State’s use of gender as a basis for peremptory challenges). Historically, whether strikes were being used based solely on gender was not an issue because, like African-Americans, women were not permitted to serve on juries. Anna M. Scruggs, \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama ex rel. T.B.: Strike Two For The Peremptory Challenge}, 26 LOY. U. CHI. L.J. 549, 556 (1995). While race was given protection from this exclusionary use of peremptory challenges after \textit{Batson}, until \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama}, gender-based challenges were not afforded this same scrutiny. \textit{Id.} at 549. Women were not permitted to serve on juries until 1946, when in \textit{Ballard v. United States}, 329 U.S. 187 (1946), the Supreme Court held that “purposeful and systematic exclusion of women from the jury venire in a federal case was inconsistent with congressional intent to make the jury a cross section of the community.” \textit{Id.} at 557 (quoting \textit{Ballard}, 329 U.S. at 191–93). In \textit{Ballard}, the Court opined:

It is said . . . that an all male panel drawn from the various groups within a community will be as truly representative as if women were included. The thought is that the factors which tend to influence women are the same as those which influence the action of men – personality, background, economic status – and not sex. Yet it is not enough to say that women, when sitting as jurors neither act nor tend to act as a class. Men likewise do not act like a class . . . . The truth is that the two sexes are not fungible; a community made up exclusively of one is different from a community composed of both; the subtle interplay of influence one has on the other is among the imponderables. To insulate the courtroom from either may not in a given case made an iota of difference. \textit{Ballard}, 329 U.S. at 193–94. Even after \textit{Ballard}, some states continued to prevent women from serving on juries outright, or through structural conditions placed on the jury selection process. Scruggs, \textit{supra}, at 557. These measures were not completely done away with until 1966 when Alabama, the only state to still hold this position, permitted women to serve. Shirley S. Abrahamson, \textit{Justice and Juror}, 20 U. GA. L. REV. 257, 269 (1986).

\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
rel. T.B., and applied equal protection analysis. In J.E.B., the Court was confronted with the issue of whether the Equal Protection Clause called for the same level of scrutiny for both race-based and gender-based peremptory challenges. The State of Alabama filed a complaint for paternity and child support against the petitioner, J.E.B. The trial court initially assembled a panel of thirty-six potential jurors, twelve of whom were male. Using nine of its ten available peremptory challenges, the State struck all of the remaining male jurors, leaving an all-female jury. Before the Supreme Court granted certiorari, both the trial court and the appellate court denied the petitioner’s objection to the State’s use of the peremptory challenges.

The Court ultimately held that peremptory challenges based on gender were in violation of the Equal Protection Clause, because, like race, gender is an unlawful ground upon which to evaluate juror competence. Responding to the State’s argument that the strikes centered on the belief that male jurors would have been more sympathetic to the defendant’s case, the Court refused to allow the State to employ gender stereotypes. In making its point, the Court

146. J.E.B., 511 U.S. at 128–29. “In Batson v. Kentucky . . . this Court held that the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment governs the exercise of peremptory challenges by a prosecutor in a criminal trial.” Id. at 128. The Court also stated that “although a defendant has no right to a ‘petit jury composed in whole or in part of persons of his own race,’ . . . the ‘defendant does have the right to be tried by a jury whose members are selected pursuant to nondiscriminatory criteria.’” Id. (citing Batson v. Kentucky, 476 U.S.79, 85–86 (1986)).

147. Id. at 129. The issue, as worded in the opinion, concerned whether the Fourteenth Amendment “forbids intentional discrimination on the basis of gender, just as it prohibits discrimination on the basis of race.” Id.

148. Id.

149. Id. After three jurors were removed for cause, only ten males remained in the pool. Id.

150. Id.

151. Id. at 129–30. Petitioner argued that the “logic and reasoning of Batson v. Kentucky, which prohibits peremptory strikes solely on the basis of race, similarly forbids intentional discrimination on the basis of gender.” Id. at 129. The trial court however rejected this claim and found the petitioner to be the father of the child and therefore liable for child support. Id. The Alabama Court of Appeals affirmed the lower court’s decision, and the Alabama Supreme Court refused to grant certiorari. Id. at 129–30.

153. J.E.B., 511 U.S. at 138 (quoting Powers v. Ohio, 499 U.S. 400, 410 (1991)). The Court asserted that it would not “accept as a defense to gender-based peremptory challenges ‘the very stereotypes the law condemns.’” Id. The State argued that its decision to strike all of the males from the jury was based upon:

[T]he perception, supported by history, that men otherwise totally qualified to serve upon a jury in any case might be more sympathetic and receptive to the arguments of a man alleged in a paternity action to be the father of an out-of-wedlock child, while women equally qualified to serve upon a jury might be more sympathetic and receptive maintained that the State failed to provide any rational, let alone persuasive, reasoning for its blatant, gender-based discrimination. After moving through the historical propensity for the exclusion of women from jury service, Justice Blackmun, writing for the majority, specifically compared gender-based discrimination to that based on race. The reasons supporting the similar treatment of these classes centers on the Equal Protection Clause of the Constitution. The Court cited to previous cases which had led to the treatment of gender as a suspect class, therefore requiring an exceedingly persuasive justification for any classification of this nature.

---

to the arguments of the complaining witness who bore the child.

Id. at 138–39.

154. Id. at 139.

Respondent offers virtually no support for the conclusion that gender alone is an accurate predictor of juror’s attitudes; yet it urges this Court to condone the same stereotypes that justified the wholesale exclusion of women from juries and the ballot box. Respondent seems to assume that gross generalizations that would be deemed impermissible if made on the basis of race are somehow permissible when made on the basis of gender.

Id. at 139–40.

155. Id. at 140. Justice Blackmun writes that,

\[ \text{Discrimination in jury selection, whether based on race or gender causes harm to the litigants, the community, and the individual jurors who are wrongfully excluded from participation in the judicial process. The litigants are harmed by the risk that the prejudice that motivated the discriminatory selection of the jury will infect the entire proceedings.} \]

Id. (citing Edmonson v. Leesville Concrete Co., 500 U.S. 614 (1991)). “The message it [allowing the peremptory strikes] sends to all those in the courtroom, and all those who may later learn of the discriminatory act, is that certain individuals, for no reason other than gender, are presumed unqualified by state actors to decide important questions upon which reasonable persons could disagree.” Id. at 142.

156. See id. at 127.

157. Cleburne v. Cleburne Living Center, 473 U.S. 432 (1985) (holding that discriminatory treatment of gender is based on fallacious impressions); Craig v. Boren, 429 U.S. 190 (1976) (stating that gender stereotypes are archaic misconceptions); Schlesinger v. Ballard, 419 U.S. 498 (1975) (holding that gender-based classifications are outdated and threaten government policies); Taylor v. Louisiana, 419 U.S. 522 (1975) (discussing the constitutionality of limiting jury service to specific groups). Treating gender as a suspect class is founded upon our Nation’s “unfortunate history” of sexual discrimination, which is likened to racial discrimination. Id. at 136. In support of this treatment, the Court cites Frontiero v. Richardson:

\[ \text{Throughout much of the 19th century the position of women in our society was, in many respects, comparable to that of blacks under the pre-Civil war slave codes. Neither slaves nor women could hold office, serve on juries, or bring suit in their own names, and married women traditionally were denied the legal capacity to hold or convey property or to serve as legal guardians of their own children... And although blacks were guaranteed the right to vote in 1870, women were denied even that right – which is itself “preservative of other basic civil and political rights” – until adoption of the Nineteenth Amendment half a century later.} \]

Id. (citing Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677, 685 (1973)).
6. Why Religious Affiliation Should be Subject to the Same Scrutiny as Race and Gender

As Batson led to cases questioning the constitutionality of gender-based peremptory strikes, so did the Supreme Court’s opinion in J.E.B. lead to cases regarding the permissibility of peremptory challenges based on religion.\footnote{158} Before examining religion-based peremptory challenges, it is important to recognize how the Supreme Court has protected religion in previous cases.\footnote{159} The Supreme Court has traditionally applied strict scrutiny to legislation that limits the free exercise of religion.\footnote{160} For a governmental act or policy to be narrowly tailored, and therefore pass strict scrutiny, it must entail the slightest possible amount of restriction in carrying out its purpose.\footnote{161} In Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah, the Court ruled that if the objective of a law is to infringe upon or restrict religiously motivated practices, the law is not neutral, and is per se invalid unless coupled with a compelling governmental interest and is narrowly tailored to advance that interest.\footnote{162} In Lukumi Babalu, the Court applied strict scrutiny to specific city ordinances that infringed upon the free exercise of religion.\footnote{163} The case specifically concerned the religious practices of the Santeria religion, which involves the ritualistic sacrifice of animals.\footnote{164} These sacrifices are traditionally performed on various occasions, including births, marriages, deaths, at the initiation of new

\begin{itemize}
\item \footnote{158}{See infra Part II.C.7 (examining State v. Davis and People v. Wheeler, in which the Minnesota and California Supreme Courts consider peremptory challenges based on religion) and Parts III.A–B (exploring how different districts have dealt with peremptory challenges with regard to religious beliefs and affiliation).}
\item \footnote{159}{See infra note 163 and accompanying text (citing to Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye v. City of Hialeah for the proposition that laws that restrict religious practices are per se invalid unless narrowly tailored to advance a compelling government interest).}
\item \footnote{160}{See generally Lukumi Babalu, 508 U.S. 520 (1993) (applying strict scrutiny to a governmental action concerning religion, and subsequently determining that the government’s interest was not strong enough to warrant upholding the regulation).}
\item \footnote{161}{Leaders, supra note 74, at 110. “In the case of peremptory strikes, the litigant can easily use the voir dire process to accurately ascertain the beliefs of the potential juror.” \textit{Id.} If the beliefs held by the potential juror prove to be prejudicial, then the juror can be removed for cause. See 28 U.S.C. § 1866(c)(2) (2000) (providing that prospective jurors may be “excluded by the court on the ground that such person may be unable to render impartial jury service”).}
\item \footnote{162}{Lukumi Babalu, 508 U.S. at 533.}
\item \footnote{163}{\textit{Id.} at 546}
\item \footnote{164}{\textit{Id.} at 524. The Santeria religion, which originated in the nineteenth century, teaches that every person has a destiny from God “fulfilled with the aid and energy of the \textit{orishas}.” \textit{Id.} “The basis of the Santeria religion is the nature of a personal relation with the \textit{orishas}, and one of the principal forms of devotion is an animal sacrifice.” \textit{Id.} It is believed that “the \textit{orishas} are powerful but not immortal. They depend for survival on the sacrifice.” \textit{Id.} at 525.}
\end{itemize}
members and priests, and for the cure of the sick.\textsuperscript{165}

The congregants of the Santeria religion in this case were organized as a corporation under Florida law for the purpose of bringing the mostly secret practices of the religion out into the open.\textsuperscript{166} In response to these plans, the City of Hialeah, Florida, adopted several ordinances prohibiting animal sacrifices and imposing fines and imprisonment on violators.\textsuperscript{167} After both the district court and court of appeals upheld the ordinances as constitutional, the Supreme Court granted certiorari and found that because the laws were not neutral and targeted religion, they must undergo the highest level of scrutiny.\textsuperscript{168}

This same strict scrutiny has been applied to all such governmental acts threatening an individual’s free exercise of religion.\textsuperscript{169} Applying strict scrutiny in the case of peremptory challenges would result in the Court being forced to weigh the least restrictive means for preserving the governmental interest in a fair trial.\textsuperscript{170} It would likely be found that the best way to obtain impartiality would be by questioning a potential juror, and then removing him or her based upon any prejudice shown, as opposed to removing all jurors of a certain religious class.\textsuperscript{171}

7. State Court Cases Regarding Religion and Peremptory Challenges

Peremptory strikes based on religion have been questioned because they are not narrowly tailored under strict scrutiny analysis.\textsuperscript{172} Two state supreme court cases have addressed whether to apply strict scrutiny to peremptory challenges based on religion.\textsuperscript{173} This Part will \textsuperscript{165} Id. at 525. “Animals sacrificed in Santeria rituals include chickens, pigeons, doves, ducks, guinea pigs, goats, sheep and turtles.” Id. After the animals are killed, they are “cooked and eaten, except after healing and death rituals.” Id.

\textsuperscript{166} Id. at 525–26. The president of the petitioner church, Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc., was one of the highest ranking officials in the Santeria religion. Id. at 525. The church acquired land in the City of Hialeah, Florida, and planned to further its initiative by establishing a worship center, cultural center, school and museum. Id. at 525–26.

\textsuperscript{167} Id. at 526–27.

\textsuperscript{168} Id. at 546. The Court held that in order to justify restricting religion, a law must advance a critical government interest and “must be narrowly tailored in pursuit of those interests.” Id.

\textsuperscript{169} Id. at 547.

\textsuperscript{170} Id.

\textsuperscript{171} See J.E.B. v. Alabama ex. rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127, 139 (1994) (holding that even if some measure of accuracy is present in using gender stereotypes, it is not constitutionally valid to rely on these generalizations).

\textsuperscript{172} Leaders, supra note 74, at 109. Religion-based peremptory strikes are “based on stereotypical assumptions about the religious views of potential jurors... Focusing on the actually held beliefs of venire members instead of inferring their beliefs from mere religious affiliation is a less restrictive alternative. Id.

\textsuperscript{173} See generally United States v. DeJesus, 347 F.3d 500 (3d. Cir. 2003) (drawing the distinction between unconstitutionally striking a juror on the basis of religious affiliation and begin with a discussion of State v. Davis, the Supreme Court of Minnesota decision stating that peremptory strikes based on religion do not violate the Equal Protection Clause.\footnote{174} Next, this Part will discuss Justice Thomas's dissent in the Supreme Court's denial of certiorari in Davis v. Minnesota.\footnote{175} Finally, this Part will discuss the Supreme Court of California's 1978 decision that a peremptory challenge based on any group bias, including religion, is unlawful under the Constitution.\footnote{176}

a. State v. Davis: The Supreme Court of Minnesota's Opinion

In August of 1993, the Supreme Court of Minnesota heard and ruled on State v. Davis.\footnote{177} The issue presented to the court was whether the Batson holding, which prohibited peremptory challenges based on race, should be extended to afford the same protection to challenges based on religion.\footnote{178} In Davis, the defendant was an African-American male charged with aggravated robbery.\footnote{179} During jury selection, the prosecution did not strike any jurors for cause, but did use one of its peremptory strikes to remove an African-American from the jury.\footnote{180} Defense counsel objected to this strike and asked for a race-neutral explanation from the prosecutor, who maintained that her choice had nothing to do with the race of the juror.\footnote{181} The prosecutor instead offered that her exercise of the peremptory strike was in response to the \footnote{174} The case was later appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, which denied certiorari. See infra Part II.C.7.a (discussing the Supreme Court of Minnesota's opinion in State v. Davis); see also Davis, 504 N.W.2d 767 (Minn. 1993) (discussing the prosecution's use of peremptory challenges in response to a potential juror's affiliation with the Jehovah's Witness faith).

\footnote{175} See infra Part II.C.7.b (discussing Justice Thomas's dissent in the Supreme Court's denial of certiorari in Davis v. Minnesota); see also Davis v. Minnesota, 511 U.S. 1115 (1994) (Thomas, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) (discussing the prosecution's use of a peremptory challenge in response to a potential juror's affiliation with the Jehovah's Witness faith).

\footnote{176} See infra Part II.C.7.c (discussing the California Supreme Court opinion in People v. Wheeler); see also People v. Wheeler, 583 P.2d 748 (Cal. 1978) (holding that use of peremptory challenges based on any group bias is an equal protection violation).

\footnote{177} Davis, 504 N.W.2d at 767. "In an unpublished opinion, the court of appeals concluded that because the peremptory strike was based on race-neutral grounds there was no equal protection violation, and, after reviewing the other claims of error, affirmed the defendant's conviction." Id. 767–68.

\footnote{178} Id. at 767.

\footnote{179} Id. at 768.

\footnote{180} Id.

\footnote{181} Id.
Because of the prosecutor's perception that the Jehovah's Witness faith incorporated a reluctance to judge others, she did not believe that the potential juror could carry out the tasks necessary as a member of the jury. Defense counsel did not rebut the prosecutor's justification for the challenge, and the trial court subsequently ruled that the peremptory challenge would stand.

The Minnesota Supreme Court began its analysis by examining the Batson line of cases discussed above. The court then compared race-based and religion-based peremptory challenges, illuminating how each of these challenges could potentially impair the reliability of the jury. The court opined that a peremptory challenge based on religion is not as commonplace or flagrant as those used to discriminate against African-American jurors pre-Batson. Using this as justification, the court

182. Id. The prosecutor explained:

[I]t was highly significant to the State that the man was a Jehovah [sic] Witness. I have a great deal of familiarity with the sect of Jehovah's [sic] Witness. I would never, if I had a preemptory [sic] challenge left, strike or fail to strike a Jehovah [sic] Witness from my jury. In my experience that faith is very integral to their daily life in many ways, many Christians are not. That was re-enforced [sic] at least three times a week he goes to church for separate meetings. The Jehovah [sic] Witness faith is of a mind the higher powers will take care of all things necessary. In my experience Jehovah [sic] Witness are reluctant to exercise authority over their fellow human beings in this Court House.

Id.

183. Id.

184. Id.

185. See supra Part II.C.1–4 (discussing the Batson line of cases dealing with peremptory challenges and race).

186. Davis, 504 N.W.2d at 769–70.

If the life of the law were logic rather than experience, Batson might well be extended to include religious bias and, for that matter, an endless number of other biases. The question, however, is whether the peremptory strike has been purposefully employed to perpetuate religious bigotry to the extent that the institutional integrity of the jury has been impaired, and thus requiring further modification of the traditional peremptory challenge.

Id. The court noted that if it were to extend the peremptory challenge protection to religion, that the list would continue to grow, and eventually defeat the very purpose of a peremptory challenge by stating:

The claim that the [peremptory] rule is in hopeless conflict with the [Batson] challenge is frequently linked to the suggestion that the ban on jury discrimination must inevitably expand to prohibit not only jury selection based on race, but also jury selection based on religion, national origin, gender, language, disability, age, occupation, political party, and a host of other categories. The relationship between the two points is clear: the longer the list of prohibited categories, the less room there is for a lawful challenge other than a challenge for cause.

Id. at 70 n.2 (quoting Barbara D. Underwood, Ending Race Discrimination in Jury Selection: Whose Right is it, Anyway?, 92 COLUM. L. REV. 725 , 761 (1992)).

187. Davis, 504 N.W.2d at 771. While the court noted the well-documented trend of racial reasoned that challenges based on religion do not have the same ubiquitously negative effect on juries as race. Therefore, the court held that religion-based peremptory strikes should not be afforded the same protection.

The court also based its opinion on the particular illusiveness of religious biases and the impediments to determining a potential juror’s religious background or beliefs. The court noted that a potential juror’s religious beliefs may be the basis for his or her moral values, which could lead to his or her societal perception on various matters. However, the court argued that these societal views cannot be attributed solely to one’s religion, and therefore a peremptory strike based on them cannot inevitably be the result of religious bias. In addition, the court discussed the risks associated with the defendant’s argument as they related to the veiled appearance associated with religion. Although some denominations require certain clothing or other perceptible signs of affiliation, many do not, causing complication when inquiring into the religion of every peremptorily dismissed juror. Upon consideration of the above, the court denied the defendant’s objection to the use of peremptory challenges.

b. Justice Thomas’s Dissent in Davis v. Minnesota

In 1994, the Supreme Court of the United States denied the defendant’s petition for certiorari in Davis v. Minnesota. However, discrimination that led to Batson, it stated that there has not been a similar history of discrimination regarding religion. Id. at 770–71.

188. Id.
189. Id. The court reasoned:

We are not aware [that] the peremptory [challenge] is being so misused [as it was with regard to racial discrimination], nor does the defendant make any such claim. No such problem is documented in appellate court decisions. . . . [T]here is no indication that irrational religious bias so pervades the peremptory challenge as to undermine the integrity of the jury system.

Id. at 771.
190. Id.
191. Id.
192. Id.
193. Id.
194. Id. The court held that “[t]o extend Batson would complicate and erode the peremptory challenge procedure unnecessarily, and it would not serve to remedy any long-standing injustice perpetrated by the court system against specific individuals and classes, as Batson clearly does.”

Id.
195. Id.
196. See generally Davis v. Minnesota, 511 U.S. 1115 (1994) (dissent from denial of certiorari discussing the use of peremptory challenges based on religion); see supra Part II.C.7.a (discussing the Supreme Court of Minnesota’s decision in State v. Davis).
Justice Thomas’s dissent, joined by Justice Scalia, offered a strong argument as to why the Court should not only have heard the case, but also should have reversed the decision denying the defendant’s challenge.\footnote{197}{Davis v. Minnesota, 511 U.S. at 1115 (Thomas, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari).}

Justice Thomas began by acknowledging that the Supreme Court of Minnesota’s basis for denial, that only race-based peremptory strikes are prohibited, is shattered by \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama}.\footnote{198}{Id. See supra Part II.C.5 (discussing J.E.B. v. Alabama, ex rel. T.B., 511 U.S. 127 (1994) (discussing \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama}, in which the Supreme Court extended its Equal Protection analysis under \textit{Batson} to prohibit gender-based peremptory strikes).} Using the rationale found in \textit{J.E.B.}, Justice Thomas opined that there was no reason to deny the protection of \textit{Batson} to all suspect classes, not only race and gender.\footnote{199}{Davis v. Minnesota, 511 U.S. at 1115.} Justice Thomas further challenged the majority by recognizing that the refusal to extend the \textit{Batson} protection is in essence choosing to avoid the ramifications of \textit{J.E.B.} The dissenting opinion concluded with the realization and acknowledgement that subjecting peremptory challenges to equal protection analysis may result in the “doom of the strike altogether,” but that it is appropriate, based on prior cases, to make this extension.\footnote{200}{Davis, 511 U.S. at 1115.}

In breaking the barrier between classifications that merit strict equal protection scrutiny and those that receive what we have termed “heightened” or “intermediate” scrutiny, \textit{J.E.B.} would seem to have extended \textit{Batson}’s equal protection analysis to all strikes based on the latter category of classifications—a category which presumably would include classifications based on religion.\footnote{201}{Id.}

While the denial of certiorari to a case arising from a strike based on a religious classification may indicate that the Court does not want to further extend \textit{Batson}, the Court has left itself open to such petitions on all of the grounds previously discussed. Although the Court may be able to draw theoretical lines among quasi-suspect classifications, it would seem that it will only be a matter of time before empirical arguments can be made about other classifications just as they have been made about race and gender. Even though racial minorities and women have suffered specific types of discrimination, it may also be that persons born out of wedlock can establish that they have been denied political rights or persons who are illegal aliens can show that discrimination against them is often a proxy for race just as gender can be. It is perhaps significant that in the Court’s own statement that the peremptory challenge has not been eliminated, the Court points to the availability of classifications of individuals subjected to “rational basis” review as potential areas for litigants to explore in their use of the peremptory challenge, but it does not point to the availability of other quasi-suspect or inherently suspect groups.
c. The California Supreme Court’s Decision in People v. Wheeler

In contrast to State v. Davis, in People v. Wheeler, the California Supreme Court held that challenges based on any group bias violates the Equal Protection Clause.\(^{202}\) The defendants were two African-American men convicted of murdering a white grocery store owner during the course of a robbery.\(^{203}\) Throughout voir dire, the prosecutor struck every African-American from the venire, and the resulting all-white jury convicted the defendants.\(^{204}\) The defense raised an objection to the removal of all of the African-Americans.\(^{205}\) Although prior to the Supreme Court’s decision in Batson, the California Supreme Court held that the removal of a specific class from the venire was unconstitutional.\(^{206}\)

The lower court’s conviction was reversed on the grounds that striking a potential juror on the basis of any group bias, including race or religion, violated state law.\(^{207}\) The Supreme Court of California held that while peremptory challenges are most times appropriately motivated by biases such as prior arrests or victimizations, it is improper to allow a party to remove a juror based on a bias that has no specific relation to the case at bar.\(^{208}\) When a potential juror is removed \(^{202}\) See generally People v. Wheeler, 583 P.2d 748 (Cal. 1978) (holding that the use of peremptory challenges based on any group bias is an equal protection violation).

\(^{203}\) Id. at 752.

\(^{204}\) Id.

\(^{205}\) Id. at 753-54. Defense counsel moved for a mistrial, stating that “seven Negroes... have been kicked off the jury by [the prosecutor], I make a motion for mistrial. It is apparent that it is a policy of the district attorney’s office not to permit any Negroes on this jury.” Id.

\(^{206}\) Id. at 761-62.

\(^{207}\) Id. The court cited several cases wherein the Supreme Court of the United States has held that an impartial jury is to be drawn from a “representative cross-section of the community.” Id. at 759. From this, the court then opined that in order to achieve the appropriate cross-section, a jury will inevitably be made up of:

>Diverse and often overlapping groups defined by race, religion, ethnic or national origin, sex, age, education, occupation, economic condition, place of residence, and political affiliation, [and] that it is unrealistic to expect jurors to be devoid of opinions, preconceptions, or even deep-rooted biases derived from their life experiences in such groups; and hence that the only practical way to achieve an overall impartiality is to encourage the representation of a variety of such groups on the jury so that the respective biases of their members, to the extent they are antagonistic, will tend to cancel each other out.

Id. at 755 (emphasis added).

\(^{208}\) Id. at 761. Biases based on previous arrests or convictions, or whether a potential juror has been the victim of a crime are:

>Essentially neutral with respect to the various groups represented on the venire: the characteristics on which they focus cut across many segments of our society—[t]hus due to a bias founded on characteristics such as race, religion, or ethnicity, the court held that the very rationale behind a jury is defeated.\textsuperscript{209} The purpose of a jury is to establish a representative group to judge the actions of the accused, and by allowing a peremptory strike based on any group bias, including religion, this demographic balance would be upset.\textsuperscript{210} For this reason, the California Supreme Court reversed the conviction by the jury from which the prospective jurors had been removed.\textsuperscript{211}

\textbf{III. DISCUSSION}

As in the state courts, there are varying opinions concerning religion and peremptory challenges among the circuits.\textsuperscript{212} This Part will begin by introducing \textit{United States v. Stafford}, a Seventh Circuit opinion written by Judge Posner, which, in dicta, insinuates that the court would not extend Batson's constitutional protections to a peremptory strike based on the religious beliefs of a potential juror, but perhaps would extend the protection to religious affiliation.\textsuperscript{213} Then, this Part will move into the recent Third Circuit decision, \textit{United States v. DeJesus}, which also affirmed the notion that a peremptory strike exercised on a potential juror's heightened religious participation is not an equal protection violation.\textsuperscript{214}

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{enumerate}
\item both blacks and whites may have prior arrests, both rich and poor may have been crime victims, both young and old may have relatives on the police force, both men and women may believe strongly in law and order, and members of any group whatever may alienate a party by "bare looks and gestures." It follows that peremptory challenges predicated on such reasons do not significantly skew the population mix of the venire in one direction or another; rather, they promote the impartiality of the jury without destroying its representativeness.
\item \textit{Id.}
\item \textit{Id.}
\item \textit{Id.}
\item \textit{Id.} at 768.
\item See infra Parts III.A and III.B (discussing how the courts dealt with peremptory challenges with regard to religious beliefs in \textit{United States v. Stafford}, and \textit{United States v. DeJesus}). See supra Parts II.C.7.a–c (discussing the decisions regarding religion and peremptory challenges coming from the Supreme Courts of Minnesota and California).
\item See infra Part III.A (explaining the Seventh Circuit's opinion in \textit{United States v. Stafford}, which held that a juror's religious convictions could be a race-neutral reason for using a peremptory challenge).
\item See infra Part III.B (discussing the Third Circuit's opinion in \textit{United States v. DeJesus}, which held a peremptory strike based on religion is valid and constitutional); see also \textit{DeJesus}, 347 F.3d 500, 509–11 (3d Cir. 2003) (discussing peremptory challenges exercised by the State to remove two jurors based on their degrees of religious involvement). See supra note 8 and accompanying text, (introducing the idea that such a strike is not an equal protection violation).
\end{enumerate}
\end{footnotesize}
A. The Seventh Circuit's Take on Religion and Peremptory Challenges: United States v. Stafford

In late 1997, the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals heard United States v. Stafford. In this case, the two defendants were convicted of a variety of charges stemming from an advance-fee loan scam. During voir dire, the government peremptorily removed the only African-American juror for reasons related to her religious beliefs. The government backed its decision by explaining its concern that the potential juror, who testified to having strong religious convictions, would be sympathetic to the defendant.

The court began its discussion like the court in Davis, exploring the Supreme Court's Batson analysis, and the feasibility of its application to religion. Batson requires that the State provide a race-neutral explanation when challenged by a defendant in regard to the motive behind a peremptory challenge. The court affirmed the trial court's finding that the reason given by the State, that her religious propensities would not allow her to perform her duties, was race-neutral and an acceptable basis for the peremptory strike. However, the court also recognized the possibility that religion could carry the same stigma as race and stated in dicta that there is a difference between striking a juror based on her religious affiliation and striking a juror based on her religious beliefs. This discussion by the court alluded to its likely

---

215. Stafford, 136 F.3d at 1109.
216. Id. at 1111. An advance-fee loan scam is set up where the defendants make a "phony offer of a large loan on highly advantageous terms upon condition that the borrower pay a sizeable fee in advance. . . . [then] [t]he con men pocket the fee and abscond." Id.
217. Id. at 1113. During the questioning, the African-American juror said that she was "very deeply involved with my church. I coordinate our homeless ministry program and have done so for the past seven years through our church." Id.
218. Id.
219. Id. at 1114.
220. Id. See supra Part II.C.3 (discussing Batson v. Kentucky).
221. Stafford, 136 F.3d at 1114. "When in response to a Batson challenge the prosecutor gives a race-neutral reason that persuades the judge, there is no basis for reversal on appeal unless the reason given is completely outlandish or there is other evidence which demonstrates its falsity. Neither condition is satisfied [here]." Id.
222. Id. The court stated in its opinion that:

It is necessary to distinguish among religious affiliation, a religion's general tenets, and a specific religious belief. It would be improper and perhaps unconstitutional to strike a juror on the basis of his being a Catholic, a Jew, a Muslim, etc. It would be proper to strike him on the basis of a belief that would prevent him from basing his decision on the evidence and instructions, even if the belief had a religious backing; suppose for example that his religion taught that crimes should be left entirely to the justice of God. In between and most difficult to evaluate from the standpoint of Batson is a religious hesitance to grant Batson’s protections to peremptory strikes based on religion.\(^{223}\)

B. United States v. DeJesus: The Most Recent Look at Religion-Based Peremptory Challenges

The Third Circuit’s decision in United States v. DeJesus is a recent court of appeals affirmation that a peremptory strike based on religious beliefs is valid and constitutional.\(^{224}\) In DeJesus, the defendant was charged with the illegal possession of a firearm after police, responding to the report of a stolen car, found him with a gun and two magazine clips.\(^{225}\) During jury selection, the State used peremptory challenges to strike two African-American jurors who both spoke of their religious involvement and spiritual beliefs during voir dire.\(^{226}\) In response, the defense counsel asserted a Batson challenge, claiming that the prosecution removed potential jurors on the basis of their race.\(^{227}\) Consequently, the State was asked to articulate the reason for its strikes. The State rationalized both of the strikes on the religious inclinations of the two potential jurors and the prospect that these beliefs would affect their willingness to convict the defendant.\(^{228}\)

In response to the State’s justification, defense counsel urged the trial

\(^{223}\) Id.

\(^{224}\) Id.

\(^{226}\) Id. The defendant’s first trial ended in a mistrial because of the jury’s inability to reach a verdict. Id. The following retrial resulted in the defendant’s conviction and subsequent sentencing to 110 months in prison. Id.

\(^{227}\) Id. The voir dire process in this trial consisted first of a questionnaire distributed to and completed by the potential jurors. Id. This phase was followed by the more traditional questioning of the jurors, and then by the opportunity for the parties to exercise their peremptory challenges. Id. The first potential juror who was peremptorily removed stated that he had a cousin who had been murdered, but that: “he had learned to forgive the murderer,” his hobbies involve “civic activities with his church,” “he reads the Christian Book Dispatcher,” he “holds several biblical degrees,” he “is a deacon and Sunday School teacher in the local church;” and he “sings in a couple of church choirs.” Id. The second potential juror who was removed from the jury because when he was brought in from the jury pool, he “looked the government’s way and then turned his eyes away several times.” Id. at 503. The state reasoned that this behavior “demonstrated a possible anti-government prejudice . . . [and that the juror’s] fairly strong religious beliefs might prevent him from rendering judgment against another human being.” Id.

\(^{228}\) Id. at 502–03. The first juror was specifically struck based on his “high degree of religious involvement and his ability to forgive his cousin’s murderer, both of which might make him reluctant to convict.” Id. The second potential juror was removed from the jury because when he was brought in from the jury pool, he “looked the government’s way and then turned his eyes away several times.” Id. at 503. The state reasoned that this behavior “demonstrated a possible anti-government prejudice . . . [and that the juror’s] fairly strong religious beliefs might prevent him from rendering judgment against another human being.” Id.
court to extend Batson by arguing that peremptory strikes based on a potential juror's religion are just as violative of the Constitution as those based on a juror's race.\(^2\) The district court denied the defense's challenge and accepted the State's strikes based on the religious grounds given by the prosecutor.\(^3\) The Third Circuit Court of Appeals affirmed the decision of the district court and held that the strikes were constitutional.\(^4\)

In its opinion, the Third Circuit did note that a peremptory strike based on a potential juror's religious affiliation would violate the Equal Protection Clause.\(^5\) Nevertheless, the court approved the State's argument that it had not exercised the peremptory challenges based on the jurors' religious affiliations, but rather on their heightened religious involvement.\(^6\) Using this rationale, the court affirmed the district court's approval of the State's peremptory challenges.\(^7\)

IV. Analysis

Based on the discussed cases and history related to religion and peremptory challenges, this Part will explain why the Supreme Court should afford religious affiliation strict scrutiny analysis when dealing with peremptory challenges.\(^8\) This Part will also, however, address the concern regarding the potential eradication of the peremptory challenge as a litigation tool if this protection is granted.\(^9\)

A. Why Peremptory Challenges Based on Religious Affiliation Are Improper

The use of peremptory challenges based on religious affiliation is flawed for several reasons.\(^10\) First, such challenges violate the Equal

---

\(^2\) Id.

\(^3\) Id. The district court's opinion stated that "while Batson may extend to protect against striking a potential juror based upon the juror's membership in a particular religious denomination having no relevance to the issues in the case, none of these jurors were struck by the government upon an impermissible ground." Id. at 504.

\(^4\) Id. at 510.

\(^5\) Id. The court stated that the defendant argued that the District Court "correctly assumed that a strike based on a juror's religious affiliation would be unconstitutional." Id. at 509.

\(^6\) Id. at 510.

\(^7\) Id. at 510–11.

\(^8\) See supra Parts II.B.1, II.C.6 (discussing religion as a suspect class and the suggested treatment of peremptory challenges based on religion).

\(^9\) See infra Part IV.B (explaining the potential effect of allowing peremptory challenges to be held up to equal protection analysis in all suspect class forums).

\(^10\) See infra notes 243–47 and accompanying text (maintaining that peremptory challenges, based on generalized views of religion, eliminate individual distinctions by assuming identical values among individuals in a group).
Protection Clause.\textsuperscript{238} Equal protection is founded upon the prohibition of the government treating classes of persons differently, or from merely treating individuals as members of a general class.\textsuperscript{239} By allowing the use of generalizations or stereotypes, the government is in violation of the constitutional rights guaranteed to individuals.\textsuperscript{240} \textit{Batson} and \textit{J.E.B.} held that peremptory challenges based on class generalizations were unconstitutional and struck down those based on race and sex.\textsuperscript{241} Like race and gender, religious affiliation is a class upon which it is inappropriate to exercise peremptory challenges.\textsuperscript{242}

Second, religion-based peremptory challenges are inappropriate because it is erroneous to assume that all members of a certain identifiable group share identical values, and therefore the strikes are not narrowly tailored.\textsuperscript{243} Empirical evidence supports the notion that not all members of a certain religion adopt the views of the establishment.\textsuperscript{244} For instance, while the common belief that all

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{238} See supra Parts II.B.1, II.C.6 (examining religion as a suspect class and the suggested treatment of peremptory challenges based on religion).
\item \textsuperscript{239} Leaders, supra note 74, at 103. Equal protection analysis requires “that the government must treat citizens as individuals and not simply as components of a racial, religious, sexual, or national class.” \textit{Id.} See generally Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228 (1982) (discussing the challenge of a Minnesota statute imposing reporting requirements for certain religious organizations).
\item \textsuperscript{240} Leaders, supra note 74, at 108. When a litigant ascribes moral, philosophical, political or social views to a potential juror merely because he or she fits into a religious group, “the potential juror is being treated as a component of his religion and not as an individual.” \textit{Id.}
\item \textsuperscript{241} See \textit{Batson v. Kentucky}, 476 U.S. 79 (1986) (holding that the intentional exclusion of African-Americans in a trial involving an African-American defendant was per se unconstitutional) and \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama} ex rel. \textit{T.B.}, 511 U.S. 127 (1994) (opining that gender-based peremptory strikes violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment); see also supra Part II.C.3 and Part II.C.5 (examining \textit{Batson v. Kentucky} and \textit{J.E.B. v. Alabama} ex rel. \textit{T.B.} and the United States Supreme Court holdings that peremptory challenges based on race and gender are equal protection violations).
\item \textsuperscript{242} Barton, supra note 54, at 204–05.
\item \textsuperscript{243} See generally Leaders, supra note 74 (discussing the stereotypes associated with religion and the mistaken perceptions about religious groups).
\item \textsuperscript{244} Id. at 108. For example, while the Catholic faith is against the use of contraceptive, studies show that as much as eighty-four percent of its members disagree with and oppose this view. \textit{Brenda Maddox, The Pope and Contraception: The Diabolical Doctrine}, 29 (1991); Gallup, The Gallup Poll: Public Opinion 1993 145 (Scholarly Resources, 1994). This fact goes to show that while religion may affect one’s moral or social views, it certainly does not unconditionally control them. In addition, it is impractical to assume that all members of a particular religious order could in fact follow and observe all of the policies and rules of the religion. Leaders, supra note 74, at 108. For example,
\end{itemize}
Catholics are opposed to abortion is a characteristic of a significant number of Catholics, it is erroneous to attribute this belief to each and every one. These generalizations suggest that religion-based peremptory challenges are not narrowly tailored because like in J.E.B., there is essentially no support for the notion that class membership alone is dispositive proof of a juror’s potential biases. Like race and gender, these types of peremptory challenges are impermissibly based on generalizations and stereotypes.

In addition, religion-based peremptory challenges are harmful because they negatively affect the individual jurors removed from the jury by insulting their constitutional right to the freedom of religion. The freedom of religion is a fundamental right that is guaranteed to all citizens of the United States, and allowing government actions affecting this right without applying strict scrutiny is violative of the Constitution.

B. The Potential Elimination of Peremptory Challenges

Although there are strongly supported constitutional arguments for recognition of Cuba.

Id. In the case of race and sex, the fact upon which prediction is based, though not entirely free from difficulties, is relatively straightforward: it is a physical fact. To found a prediction on the basis of a person’s religion, however, is to make reference to a fact of considerable uncertainty. Thus a person’s religion may refer to something about his state of mind, to his relations with other persons or with an institution, to his external behavior, or to his cultural inheritance.

247. Barton, supra note 54, at 209. “The government has an interest in guaranteeing a fair trial, but the lack of evidence supporting religion-based peremptory challenges’ role in supplying an impartial jury leads to the conclusion that such peremptories are not sufficiently narrowly tailored to fit the governmental interest.” Id. at 210.

248. Leaders, supra note 74, at 108–09.

249. Barton, supra note 54, at 207. “A government religious classification which results in members of a religion being denied the opportunity to serve on a jury clearly constitutes a ‘burden’ on the free exercise of religion.” Id. Allowing peremptory challenges based on religious affiliation is in effect “a form of state-sponsored group stereotype rooted in, and reflective of, historical prejudice.” Lieutenant Colonel Patricia A. Ham, Crossing the I’s and Dotting the T’s: The Year in Court-Martial Personnel, Voir Dire and Challenges, and Pleas and Pretrial Agreements, 2004 ARMY LAW. 10, 22 (2004). “Such strikes, like those based on race and gender, cause harm to the litigants, the community, and the individual jurors who are wrongfully excluded from participation in the judicial process.” Id.
invalidating religion-based peremptory challenges, the practical ramifications of such a decision are somewhat staggering.250 Allowing further restriction on the use of peremptory challenges would be another strike against the uninhibited use for which these devices were created.251 This added restriction could eventually prevent the peremptory challenge from performing its primary function of ensuring an impartial jury, consequently rendering the judicial tool obsolete.252

With a growing number of classifications that could trigger suspicion under the Equal Protection Clause, granting religion this ultimate protection may start the peremptory challenge on a slippery slope, eventually resulting in the abandoning of the peremptory challenge altogether.255 Forcing the state to articulate a non-invidious motive for a peremptory challenge, while at the same time limiting its options, is not in tune with allowing parties to strike peremptorily.254 Some courts have already noted that the continual extension of peremptory strike protection to an increasing number of suspect classes may have damaging repercussions on the life of the peremptory strike.255 However, it has also been noted that while peremptory challenges have been a steadfast part of our judicial system, their elimination may not be

250. See generally Proof of Religion in the Courtroom that Violates the Right to a Fair Trial, 73 AM. JUR. PROOF OF FACTS 3D § 89 (2003) (discussing religion’s relation to potential juror bias); Gary J. Simson & Stephen P. Garvey, Knockin’ on Heaven’s Door: Rethinking the Role of Religion in Death Penalty Cases, 86 CORNELL L. REV. 1090 (2001) (discussing how the actual religious beliefs of a member, as opposed to the doctrinal beliefs of the religion, make generalization difficult); Johnstone, supra note 200 at 441 (recognizing the difficulty in correlating beliefs to specific religious affiliations in the fact of the infinite variations of each juror’s religious experience); Leaders, supra note 74; Angela J. Mason, Discrimination Based on Religion Affiliation: Another Nail in the Peremptory Challenge’s Coffin?, 29 GA. L. REV. 493 (1995) (examining the potential for peremptory challenges to become obsolete by offering protection to religion).
251. Bell Chambers, supra note 73, at 608.
252. Id.; see also Mason, supra note 250, at 493, 536–37 (discussing the slippery slope by which the peremptory challenge may be eliminated).
253. Colb, supra note 29 at ¶ 39.
254. Id. at ¶ 39–40. “Once scrutiny and review are the rule rather than the exception, peremptory challenges may become simply watered down ‘for cause’ challenges, in which the reasons can be somewhat less persuasive but still permissible.” Id. at ¶ 40.
255. A Florida appellate court case acknowledged this danger, stating “[this decision] marks the beginning of the end of the unfettered use of the peremptory challenge in this state.” Alen v. State, 596 So. 2d 1083, 1086 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1992) (Hubbart, J., concurring). The court predicted that the decision, forbidding discriminatory peremptory strikes against African-Americans because of their race, would eventually extend to ban all forms of peremptory challenges, “whether based on race, ethnic origin, nationality, gender, religion, wealth, or age.” Id. The court further opined, “it seems obvious that the peremptory challenge system, as we know it, is totally doomed.” Id. at 1087. The Florida Supreme Court also recognized that the decision “may be characterized by some as another nail in the coffin of the peremptory challenge system.” Joseph v. State, 636 So.2d 777, 781 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1994).
all that negative. The peremptory challenge has been argued to not effectively remove bias from the jury. In fact some studies have shown that prosecutors peremptorily strike as many jurors that fit the perception of unwilling to convict as those actually willing to find the defendant guilty. Ultimately, some argue that these inconsistencies render the peremptory challenge not as beneficial to the judicial system as first thought. Therefore, although outlawing religion-based peremptory challenges could advance the downfall of this judicial tool, the consequences could be less serious than expected.

V. PROPOSAL

While state and federal courts have not yet reached a consensus on whether peremptory strikes based on religion are constitutional, there is a developing theme regarding the difference between religious affiliation and religious beliefs. To reconcile the differing opinions among the courts, it is important that the Supreme Court grant certiorari

256. See Jeffrey Abramson, Abolishing the Peremptory, but Enlarging the Challenge for Cause, at http://www.apa.udel.edu/apa/archive/newsletters.v96n2/law/abolish/asp (Spring 1997) (discussing the peremptory challenges’ inability to eliminate bias).

The peremptory system would be worth preserving only if there were credible evidence that it did more to remove bias from the jury (by eliminating prejudiced individuals) than to bring it in (by skewing dynamic deliberation across group lines). But one impressive empirical study of the pre-Batson era gave the peremptory challenge only a mixed review. Overall, it found the “collective performance of the attorneys... not impressive.” Prosecutors were as likely to strike persons who ended up voting to convict as to acquit. Defense counsel did “slightly better.” The researchers were mostly struck by the erratic benefits of peremptory challenges. Although on average the defense gained an advantage through peremptory challenges, that average was misleading because there was such disparity from case to case in the performance of counsel. These “adversarial inequities” did not paint a pretty picture of the larger public purposes served by peremptory challenges. The potential to imbalance the jury was great when one side was legally entitled to a greater number of peremptory challenges or simply had more luck or skill in using an equal number of them.

258. Id.

259. Id.

260. See supra notes 257–59 and accompanying text (explaining the limitations of the peremptory challenge).

261. Colb, supra note 29, at ¶ 19. See also United States v. Stafford, 136 F.3d 1109, 1114 (7th Cir. 1998) (discussing in dicta the use of peremptory challenges in relation to religious beliefs and affiliation); United States v. DeJesus, 347 F.3d 500 (N.J. 2003) (examining the use of peremptory challenges exercised by the State to remove two jurors based on their degrees of religious involvement).
on the issue and resolve the present ambiguities.\textsuperscript{262}

When analyzed, it should be found that discrimination based on the religious affiliation of a potential juror is inappropriate, while the decision is not as apparent regarding a strike based on the strength of one's religious beliefs.\textsuperscript{263} Some have compared the strength of religious beliefs to race and gender in terms of devotion or commitment.\textsuperscript{264} Viewing one's religious conviction as opposed to religious affiliation is similar to considering a male juror who believes that women are unworthy of equal treatment, or a Caucasian juror who is a white supremacist.\textsuperscript{265} Although both of these examples involve suspect classifications, using a peremptory strike to remove either juror is not inherently based on a person's class (i.e., race or gender).\textsuperscript{266} Instead, it is based on the intensity and conviction with which one chooses to observe a belief, and the possibility that these beliefs could interfere with a person's participation as an unbiased juror.\textsuperscript{267}

If it were apparent that a juror holds great conviction in his religious beliefs, no matter what his affiliation may be, it would probably be appropriate to exclude that person based upon the bias brought to the jury.\textsuperscript{268} Therefore, while it is probably not within the boundaries of the

\begin{flushleft}
\textsuperscript{262} See supra Part II.C.7.b (addressing the arguments of and questions posed by the dissent in the United States Supreme Court's denial of the defendant's petition for certiorari in \textit{Davis v. Minnesota}).

\textsuperscript{263} Theresa Osterman Stevenson states that,

[r]eligious affiliation is being viewed much the same as race or gender, while religious beliefs are being analyzed as much closer to the sorts of things upon which we have traditionally exercised a peremptory challenge. . . . A Muslim could not be struck from the trial of a Muslim terrorist simply because he is a Muslim, any more than a Catholic could be struck from a death penalty case simply because he is a Catholic . . . [t]he distinction is between the potential jurors' religious status and their belief in a particular tenet.

\textsuperscript{264} Colb, supra note 29, at ¶ 33–38.

\textsuperscript{265} Id.

[A] potential juror might describe himself as a member of the 'men's movement' who believes that women have encroached on male prerogatives and have turned masculine creatures into effeminate losers . . . [a]nother might describe herself as a women whose greatest loyalty is to women and who considers herself a woman first and a citizen second. She might spend most of her time engaging in activism connected to her commitment to women's empowerment.

\textit{Id.} at ¶ 34.

\textsuperscript{266} Id. at ¶ 33–38.

\textsuperscript{267} Id.

\textsuperscript{268} Mansfield, supra note 244, at 472–73.

Depending on what is meant by the religion of the juror, the predictive value of the fact
Constitution to exercise a peremptory challenge based on a juror's religious affiliation, the Supreme Court should set forth an opinion stating that it is acceptable to strike a juror based on that prospective juror’s religious beliefs.269

VI. CONCLUSION

There is a long history of discrimination in the selection of juries. It began with the complete exclusion of African-Americans from the venire through the use of statutes and local law. After this practice was outlawed following the inception of the Fourteenth Amendment, prosecutors began to rely on their peremptory challenges to create the same effect. However, the Supreme Court found that race-based peremptory challenges were unconstitutional and made it unlawful for prosecutors to continue the practice of exercising them in this manner. The Court furthered its stance on the discriminatory use of peremptory challenges with its more recent declaration that peremptory challenges are no longer permitted based on gender.

The Supreme Court should extend this analysis and rule against the government’s ability to exercise peremptory challenges based upon a potential juror’s religious affiliation. Religion is commonly afforded the same protections as both race and gender, and it should be no different in the case of peremptory challenges. Because of the confusion surrounding the topic and the divergence in the various states and circuits, the Supreme Court should grant certiorari on the issue and opt to prohibit the further use of peremptory challenges to remove jurors based upon their religious affiliations and also address the issue of juror removal based on religious beliefs.

Id. See also U.S. v. Stafford, 136 F.3d 1109, 1114 (7th Cir. 1998) (stating the difference between using a peremptory challenge based on a juror’s religious beliefs and striking a juror based on that juror’s religious affiliation); State v. Purcell, 18 P.3d 113 (Ariz. Ct. App. 2001) (holding that Batson extends to include peremptory strikes based upon religious affiliation); People v. Martin, 75 Cal. Rptr. 2d 147 (Cal. Ct. App. 1998) (discussing cases in which jurors have been stricken based on their religious beliefs); State v. Eason, 445 S.E.2d 917 (N.C. 1994) (examining when it is proper to strike a juror based on the juror’s religious convictions).

269. See Mason, supra note 250, at 503 (stating that there has been little guidance about whether Batson should be extended to include religious membership); Larson v. Valente, 456 U.S. 228, 244–46 (1982) (discussing the application of strict scrutiny to religious affiliation).